When we arrived in the area the first thing we saw was this big grey building and those huge reddish towers. After walking a little we realized the building on our left was the headquarters of TV3 channel. The contrast between this rectangular mass and the living place of the population struck us. There even were barbed wires on top of the fences which seemed kind of out of place.

Pablo and Ivan are two teenagers that live in the residencial area of SJD. They told us that their favorite place is the basketball court in the center of the neighborhood where they often come to play. They sometimes get to the city center to meet with friends from other neighborhoods. They do not really go there though.

There is a small shared garden that old people over 60 can access. It's located in the back of the residencial area just next to the parc. We found really surprising that it was only reserved for old people and this could be a bigger project that can bring people from all Sant Joan Despí. The idea is amazing since people are living in building and they can't have their own garden at home.

Natalia is a middle aged woman who works in Barcelona. She likes to walk her dog in the parc next to her apartment. She finds it calming and allows her to get a change of scenery for the end of her day. It's also a good way of crossing people especially other dog owners.

The whole neighborhood is surrounded by the Font Santa parc. There were a lot of kids with their mother or father playing around. It has a lot of large, green areas and is rather clean. It allows the buildings to be separated from the industrial zone but in some way isolates them too from other neighborhoods. People of all ages enjoy roaming in the parc whether it is to play, run, walk their pet or just walk about.
