This teaching guide has been coordinated with the teachers of Ancient History of the Department of Sciences of Antiquity and the Middle Ages.

Objectives and Contextualisation

This subject aims to approach students to the knowledge of the main historical processes and cultural events of the civilizations of the ancient world, without forgetting the philological orientation, which is the main basis of the methodology, for which the original sources, presented in a bilingual version, to document the processes studied.

The Civilization of Rome course studies Roman civilization in a broad sense. In addition to historical issues, we also discussed other areas of Roman civilization during the periods studied, such as literature, thought, private life, art, religion, politics, etc. The contents are analyzed from historical or literary texts of Greek and Roman authors, as well as inscriptions or other archaeological remains, which are the basis for the development of the subject.
