Prerequisites

This course requires a general knowledge in economics and organizational behavior.

Objectives and Contextualisation

Human resources are a fundamental element of organizations. This is even more important for the economies of our closest environment, increasingly oriented to services. On the other hand, many organizations present in our environment are or have international relations, which implies the need to study the management of people in a much more complex economic and cultural situation than could be found a few years ago.

The subject aims to provide a vision of human resources in which the main strategic aspects are considered to allow an understanding of the processes that are carried out in this area of the companies.

The objectives of the subject are, therefore:

Understanding the concept of strategic management of human resources; understand the mechanisms of information and communication in the company; Analyze and assimilate issues to be taken into account when defining the provision of human resources. Define the training and development policy; understand the objectives and the instruments to evaluate the performance and the compensation; combine all the previous elements in order to design professional careers and the possible redimension processes of the organization. Finally, the student must be able to make a definition of the human resources strategy and application of policies for different types of organizations, in different circumstances, in order to increase the generation of value.
