Objectives and Contextualisation

The growing visibility of religions in the public sphere, coupled with contemporary processes of transformation of religious belongings and identities around the globe, places a crucial importance on the study of religions. In spite of the predictions of secularization theory, religion today remains a key element in understanding the contemporary world, both globally and locally. On the one hand, the importance of studying the relationships between migratory movements, international politics and global religious actors. On the other hand, at the local level, the diversification of urban scenarios and the emergence of new challenges for the accommodation of religious diversity.

The objective of this course is to offer a critical vision of the relationship between religion and politics in the contemporary world. The will is to explore and understand how religion has shaped, and has been shaped by, the diverse world political, social and cultural transformations. In parallel, the course addresses key issues such as the (complex) relationship between gender and religion, the links between body, spirituality and politics, as well as the articulation of religion(s) and political movements.

The course is taught from an interdisciplinary approach combining the sociological perspective together with political science, anthropology, international relations and religious studies. The program combines theoretical and critical lectures, together with an ethnography lab where empirical (and applied) research will be shared and discussed.

Assessment

The subject is evaluated with three types of exercises:

1. A final non-memorative test in which the student must demonstrate that he/she has understood and assimilated the main contents of the program. This test will have a weight of 40% of the mark.

2. An empirical work (preferably in a group of three) that, with an ethnographic approach, will develop some of the topics addressed in the Lab, accompanied by group tutorials with one of the tutors. This work is 50% of the final grade.

3. Finally, although it is not mandatory to pass the subject, there will be an oral/public defense exercise for 8 minutes of the empirical work. This evaluation will be partially supervised and evaluated by experts in the subject. This test will have a weight of 10%.

The possibility of making up the final test is considered if the mark obtained is equal to or greater than 4.
