Preface

❖ Catalan lyric (dis)memory[1]

When we talk about "teatre líric català", or Catalan lyric theater, we're referring to a greatly forgotten field in Catalan culture, overlooked for way too long. While its definition remains somewhat ambiguous due to a lack of cataloguing and documentation of the repertoire, we are discussing a Modernist movement of about 25 years that gave us great titles and melodies that still survive in popular memory, such as the sardanas of La santa espina, La nit de l'amor or Rosó's song.

We are talking about pieces, currently unknown to the public, such as El Comte l'Arnau by Enric Morera or La presó de Lleida by Jaume Pahissa, which were performed hundreds of times on the stage of the Principal theater, or L'alegria que passa, which remained on theater billboards across Barcelona practically uninterruptedly for more than 20 years.

And not only Barcelona, because Catalan lyric theater was a movement to which the whole of Catalonia was committed. Beyond the (still not too) well-known seasons arranged by Morera and his Teatre Líric Català company at the Tívoli theater, or the Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater, other seasons, companies and associations existed from Girona to Reus, including cities in between such as Terrassa, Manresa or Tarragona, among many other municipalities. These places not only imported the premiered titles from Barcelona, but also produced their own Catalan lyrical theater pieces.

We are also talking about actors and singers who projected their lyrical careers in theater exclusively in Catalan language. Assumpció Paricio is a prime example: the face of countless magazine covers and the protagonist name for the premiere of many productions. The first Zaira of L'alegria que passa in 1900, the first lyrical actress of the Principal theater under the management of Lluís Graner (1905-07), owner of her own lyrical company in 1915, and again the head actress in Morera's restitution of the Teatre Líric Català company in 1922. But we still haven't written her biography, nor her entry has yet been included in encyclopedias.

What has happened, though, so that we don't know anything about them now? Why does historiography claim that Catalan lyric theater "does not exist" or that it was "a failure" that is not worth studying? Its history, which has yet to be properly written, is a pending task of great urgency for the Catalan cultural memory, unattended by academia, just as the Catalan cultural institutions have neglected the recovery of this intangible cultural heritage.

During the writing of this dissertation, the Catalan opera Gal·la Placídia (1913) by Guimerà and Pahissa was brought back to the stage in Madrid in 2024. In recent years, the Teatro de la Zarzuela has also reprised other operas by Catalan composers from this period, such as Pahissa's Marianela (1923) in 2020 and Pedrell's La Celestina (1902) in 2022. But how many of them have we been able to listen to in Barcelona?

The repertoire of Catalan lyric theater remains largely unseen, covered by dust in the drawers and shelves of archives and libraries. The number of preserved materials is enormous: we keep hundreds of librettos, playbills, photographs, and postcards. Even wardrobe pieces, like Maria Morera's dress for La reina vella [The old queen] written by Guimerà and Morera, which became iconic due to the popular sensation that it caused. Even people dressed like her during carnival in Barcelona. However, we still do not even have a catalog documenting these pieces. Perhaps it's time to take a look back at them and start remembering.

❖ Project memoire and acknowledgements

The initial spark that lit the idea to start this doctoral project came actually from the study of zarzuela. The first acknowledgments of this dissertation have to be dedicated to the Fundación Jacinto e Inocencio Guerrero and its director Alberto González Lapuente for introducing me to the professional world of Spanish lyric theater and for the trust deposited on me —while being still such a young student— to lead the coordination of their exhibitions during 2019 and 2020.

Anyone acquainted with the repertoire of zarzuela can think of several titles in which this musical genre represents on stage the different regional identities of Spain: Gigantes y cabezudos (1898) portrays traditions from Aragón, Azucarillos y aguardiente (1897) does so with the popular archetypes and characters from popular life in Madrid, Maruxa (1914) presents a Galician pastoral romance, El caserío (1926) depicts Basque peasant life, and La rosa del azafrán (1930) shows the life in Castilian fields, as well as endless other examples. However, what happens with Catalan identity and where are the lyric titles based on their traditions? The answer was: unstudied and out of the current canon.

The reputation of the Institut del Teatre in Barcelona and their master's degree in Theater Studies specialized in History and Theory of Performance allowed me to initiate my studies in Catalan theater. I have to acknowledge in this regard the lessons learned from Enric Gallén on Catalan Modernist theater, introducing me for the first time to figures such as Santiago Rusiñol or Adrià Gual, which have kept since then a pivotal position in the research that I have carried out in the following years.

The fellowship for the Training of University Professors (Formación del Profesorado Universitario) conceded by the Ministry of Universities of Spain allowed me to continue the investigation on this topic, funding the research that is now presented here. My acknowledgements must continue with Francesc Cortès for accepting the supervision of this project and for allowing me to freely explore the topic of Catalan lyric theater.

In the four years that this project has endured, multiple academic challenges have come across, all overcome in the best way that I knew.

„Tad norėčiau pasirodyti nė geresniu, nė blogesniu, negu iš tiesų esmi. [...] Gyvenau taip, kaip mokėjau ir galėjau, visuomet siekdamas tam tikro idealo. O kad idealo neatsiekiau, tai bus kiekvienam aišku, kas perskaitys mano bruožus, labai netobulai nupieštus."

"So I would like to appear neither better nor worse than I really am. [...] I lived as well as I knew how and as I could, always striving for some sort of ideal. And that I haven't reached that ideal will be clear to anyone who reads my features, so non-ideally portrayed."

Jonas Šliūpas

Jaunatvė – gyvenimo pavasaris
[Youth – the spring of life], 1927, p. 48.

The results can be seen in the multiple publications and papers read at several congresses along these years, which are eventually compiled and resumed here. A special mention is to be made to the Música y prensa study group from the Sociedad Española de Musicología led by Teresa Cascudo for accepting me to my first congress participation, as well as to the Music in Society / Muzika u društvu symposium and the people from the Sarajevo Academy of Music for the chance to present my research abroad for the first time.

I also have to thank the multiple scholars that have provided me with their feedback, teachings and discussions, with a special remark to the research team from the "Between the times" project in Tallinn University, Michael Cole from Tartu University and Nico Carpentier from Charles University in Prague for mentoring the PhD training courses that I have been able to attend and enjoy, which have undoubtedly marked the direction that this dissertation has eventually followed.

A special note in this matter has to be made regarding the international research stay carried out at the Lithuanian Music and Theater Academy, which has been a turning point in this project and my research path, providing me with a much needed inter- and trans-national point of view. I have to acknowledge the involvement of Rūta Stanevičiūtė in accepting my visit to their Research Centre and supervising my stay in Vilnius, as well the support and guidance of Danutė Petrauskaitė in the archival study of Lithuanian musical theater, both truly appreciated.

This section could not end without a final acknowledgement of Toni Font's effort and support in promoting Catalan musical theater, both the present and the past repertoire, and in the divulgation of Catalan lyric theater memory through his project TeatreMusical.cat and the multiple interviews and documentaries that he has produced involving my research.

The process of writing and editing this dissertation would have been much more difficult without the support of Daniel and Justinas, who patiently listened to and discussed all my ideas.

My kind regards to all of them,

José Miguel

Abstract

One of the main worries of Catalan nationalism during its early 20th century revival was the establishment of a national genre of lyric theater.

Catalan historiography has studied this phenomenon as an initiative without successful results coming from a unified nationalism, presenting the "Catalan lyric theater" movement as a chaotic conglomerate of different pieces and genres that could not achieve to settle a big-format national opera. Meanwhile, from the field of zarzuela studies, the national difference has simply been denied, presenting the Catalan repertoire as a regional variation of the zarzuela genre.

To solve this conjuncture, the concept of segmented pluralism is applied to Catalan cultural nationalism, dividing it into different ideological branches that actually resemble the dynamics of opposition. These different segments are identified by performing a critical discourse analysis on press criticism, essays and artistic theories, linking their authors with broader social networks.

Once all the musical proposals to become "the national genre" are classified, we can conclude that the different artistic criteria corresponded to different ideological discourses. Each segment "nationalized" preexisting genres of musical theater by introducing the symbolic elements that they considered representative of the Catalan identity according to their moral and political values.

Especial attention is paid to the genre of "musical visions", widely unattended by previous research. The influence of European symbolism on the conception of the genre is studied, along with its multimodal nature. Under the artistic direction of painters, the genre is pictured as an "alive painting", experimenting with electric lighting design, as if it was a moving impressionist picture. Accompanied by music and poetic lyrics, the scenes aim to the sensorial suggestion of emotional states rather than the narration of any plot.

The dramaturgical elements are discursively analyzed to identify the ideological meaning that is intended to transmit to the audience. Special attention is paid to the quotation of folk songs, medieval mythology and religious topics as symbolic references to the Catalan historical nationality according to Prat de la Riba's theories and Torras i Bages' doctrine.

Resumen:

Una de las principales preocupaciones del nacionalismo catalán durante su renacimiento a principios del siglo XX fue la creación de un género nacional de teatro lírico.

La historiografía catalana ha estudiado este fenómeno como una iniciativa sin resultados satisfactorios promovida por un nacionalismo unificado, presentando el movimiento del "teatro lírico catalán" como un conglomerado caótico de diferentes obras y géneros que no logró consolidar una ópera nacional de gran formato. Mientras tanto, desde los estudios de zarzuela, la diferencia nacional ha sido simplemente negada, presentando el repertorio catalán como una variación regional del género zarzuelístico.

Para resolver esta coyuntura, se aplica el concepto de pluralismo segmentado a la visión del nacionalismo catalán, dividiéndolo en diferentes ramas ideológicas que se aproximan a las dinámicas de oposición. Estos diferentes segmentos se identificarán mediante un análisis crítico del discurso documentado en la crítica de la prensa, ensayos y teorías artísticas, vinculando a sus autores con redes asociativas e ideológicas más amplias.

Una vez clasificadas todas las propuestas escénicas para convertirse en "el género nacional", podemos concluir que los diferentes criterios artísticos corresponden con diferentes discursos ideológicos. Cada segmento se dedica a "nacionalizar" géneros preexistentes de teatro musical introduciendo los elementos simbólicos que consideran representativos de la identidad catalana según sus valores morales, religiosos y políticos.

El género de las "visiones musicales" merece especial estudio debido a su desatención en estudios previos. Se tratará la influencia del simbolismo europeo en su concepción, junto con su naturaleza multimodal. Bajo la dirección artística de pintores, el género se concibe como una "pintura viva", experimentando con el diseño de iluminación eléctrica, como si fuese un cuadro impresionista en movimiento. Acompañadas de música y letras poéticas, las escenas pretenden sugerir sensitivamente estados emocionales, más que narrar una trama.

El análisis discursivo de los elementos dramatúrgicos permitirá identificar el significado ideológico que se pretende transmitir al público. Merecen especial atención la escenificación de canciones populares, mitología medieval y temas religiosos como referencias simbólicas a la nacionalidad histórica catalana según las teorías de Prat de la Riba y la doctrina de Torras i Bages.

Resum:

Una de les principals preocupacions del nacionalisme català durant el seu període de renaixença a principis del segle XX va ser la creació d'un gènere nacional de teatre líric.

La historiografia catalana ha estudiat aquest fenomen com una iniciativa sense resultats satisfactoris promoguda per un nacionalisme unificat, presentant el moviment del "teatre líric català" com un conglomerat caòtic de diferents obres i gèneres que no va aconseguir consolidar una òpera nacional de gran format. Mentrestant, des dels estudis de sarsuela, la diferència nacional ha estat simplement negada, presentant el repertori català com una variació regional del gènere sarsuelístic.

Per a resoldre aquesta conjuntura, s'aplica el concepte de pluralisme segmentat a la visió del nacionalisme català, dividint-lo en diferents branques ideològiques que mostren similituds amb les dinàmiques d'oposició. Aquests diferents segments s'identificaran mitjançant una anàlisi crítica del discurs documentat a la crítica de la premsa, assajos i teories artístiques, vinculant els seus autors amb xarxes associatives i ideològiques més àmplies.

Una vegada classificades totes les propostes escèniques que volien convertir-se en "el gènere nacional", podem concloure que els diferents criteris artístics corresponen amb diferents discursos ideològics. Cada segment va "nacionalitzar" gèneres preexistents de teatre musical introduint els elements simbòlics que consideraven representatius de la identitat catalana segons els seus valors morals, religiosos i polítics.

El gènere de les "visions musicals" mereix especial estudi degut a la seva desatenció en estudis previs. Es tractarà la influència del simbolisme europeu en la seva concepció, juntament amb la seva naturalesa multimodal. Sota la direcció artística de pintors, el gènere es concep com una "pintura viva", experimentant amb el disseny d'il·luminació elèctrica, com si fos un quadre impressionista en moviment. Acompanyades de música i lletres poètiques, les escenes pretenen suggerir sensitivament estats emocionals, més que narrar una trama.

L'anàlisi discursiva dels elements dramatúrgics permetrà identificar el significat ideològic que es pretén transmetre al públic. Mereixen especial atenció l'escenificació de cançons populars, mitologia medieval i temes religiosos com a referències simbòliques a la nacionalitat històrica catalana segons les teories de Prat de la Riba i la doctrina de Torras i Bages.

Introduction

❖ What is the "Catalan lyric theater" movement?

One of the main worries of Catalan nationalism during its early 20th century revival was the establishment of a national genre of lyric theater. After the initial revindication of the cultural use of Catalan language during the Renaixença period between 1870 and 1890, a strong cultural mobilization began to broaden the nationalist interest from only language and literature to also encompass other artistic disciplines. Their aim was to create Catalan national styles in the different fields of art, paying special attention to musical theater as the "total art" that includes all the disciplines.

Although the first lyric titles in Catalan language can be traced back to mid-19th century, it is during the turn of the 19th to the 20th century that the production of lyric theater in Catalan was consolidated. This tendency became a movement led by a conscious activist intention with the goal of institutionalizing a new national genre with stable seasons. It was the involved authors who gave it the name of "teatre líric català" [Catalan lyric theater] during the period of Catalan Modernisme, the regional variant of the international Art Nouveau movement, taking place from the 1890s until the early 1920s.

The movement known as Catalan lyric theater has been portrayed as a conglomerate of multiple and diverse initiatives, companies, and intellectuals. They shared the goal of conceptualizing and institutionalizing a national genre of lyric theater in Catalonia, fueled by the considerable popularity of Spanish zarzuela and Italian opera in the region, considered by intellectuals as foreign genres. A brief outline of the main companies and initiatives is presented here to provide an introductory context to the reader, which will be further developed in chapter 1.

It is considered that the movement was initiated by La fada, written by Enric Morera (1865–1942) and J. Massó i Torrents (1863–1943), premiered at the 1897 edition of the Sitges Modernist Festivals[2]. On that same year, Santiago Rusiñol (1861–1931) wrote L'alegria que passa, for which also Morera would write the music, becoming the first and biggest commercial success of the movement.

Also in 1897, Adrià Gual (1872–1943) arranged the lyrics of Blancaflor, a "Catalan folk song harmonized for the stage" by Enric Granados (1867–1916). This piece was presented to the public in 1899 as part of a different aesthetic proposal that was not initially well-received. It wouldn't be until 1900 that Enric Morera invested in the Teatre Líric Català project to institutionalize the movement with a stable season. Despite these efforts, the project was halted due to a lack of financial resources and external support.

[2] The original name being "Festes Modernistes de Sitges", these Modernist Festivals were held annually in Sitges and congregated the Modernist intellectuals to share their writings and poetry in lectures, including concerts and dramatic representations.

The term “teatre líric català” (Catalan lyric theater) can be considered a self-given name that the people involved in the movement used to designate their repertoire and companies. It was used as a label for the idealized new national genre that they were trying to conceptualize. However, the same term was also utilized to name the company that was established in 1900 by Enric Morera and for the association Foment del Teatre Líric Català, created a few years later. This association was presided by Adrià Gual and was established with the objective of promoting the stabilization of the repertoire with a whole permanent season of Catalan operetta and the creation of schools for actors and singers in the Catalan language.

Nevertheless, in 1904, painter Lluís Graner (1863–1929) sponsored the lyric movement becoming a theater impresario. He opened the “sala Mercè”, a small hall in the Rambla of Barcelona, for which he revived Gual’s theories on the folk song as the theoretical base for his genre of “musical visions”, also hiring him as stage director. For the following season, he rented out the Principal theater of Barcelona to bring his proposal to a full-scale stage installing there the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. However, after a few seasons he ended up facing financial bankruptcy despite his public success.

After Graner’s bankruptcy, Morera tried to revive his Catalan Lyric Theater company in 1910 and failed to maintain the whole 1910/11 season. Since then, the movement was disseminated into small itinerant companies, singles premieres on seasons mixed with spoken theater or amateur productions. At this moment, the artistic movement of Modernisme was already coexisting with Noucentisme, which would eventually take the lead and substitute Modernism on the 1920’s with different cultural initiatives and artistic values. The new generation of artists, that actually started their careers while still being very young with Graner (like Josep Carner [1884–1970] or Jaume Pahissa [1880–1969]), focused on the genre of opera, while the popular trends were led towards Catalan couplet or variétés, leaving the space in between, occupied formerly by lyric theater, now empty.

❖ Literature review and historiographical issues[3]

Musicological studies have generally shown little interest in Catalan lyric theater, applying a Wagnerian viewpoint under which neither the Symbolist nor the folklorist approaches have been valued. Catalan lyric theater, which alternated sung and spoken passages to compete commercially with Castilian zarzuela, has been considered inferior to attempts to establish a Catalan opera, a genre regarded as more elevated. The genre of glossed folk songs has been considered "folkloric and simplistic", with perspectives "not very optimistic, which did not allow them to venture into productions on the scale of Wagnerian librettos", and "even when it comes to a work of greater scope, such as La santa espina [The holy thorn] by Guimerà and Morera, it is titled a "rondalla" [fable or tale][4]". Moreover, part of the Catalanist sector of the time, especially that centered around the journal Joventut, also harshly criticized the project in line with their Wagnerian ideology[5].

The first and still the main referential study that has tried to arrange all these initiatives and companies involving the concept of Catalan lyric theater to construct a historical narrative is found in La música i el modernisme (1985) by Xavier Aviñoa[6]. In it, the starting point of the movement has been considered to be La fada, a one-act opera with Wagnerian intertextual references that premiered at 1897 in Sitges, written by Enric Morera and J. Massó i Torrents. Aviñoa's study focuses on identifying the professional companies and seasons that took place in the city of Barcelona, from Morera's Teatre Líric Català season in 1901, its reprise in 1903, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner between 1905–1908, and the new Teatre Líric Català seasons in 1910 and 1922.

The institutionalization of the Catalan lyric theater movement as a stable company with consecutive seasons was a permanent struggle for Catalanism. Several initiatives took place, but they all enjoyed a short life due to inconsistent revenues and lack of funds to continue the projects after the first initial budget is invested. Aviñoa's narrative presents all these projects as continuations of the same major national project, portraying a unified action of Catalanism towards the achievement of the same goal: institutionalizing a national genre of lyric theater in Catalonia. Moreover, Enric Morera is positioned as the lead figure of all these initiatives: he's the artistical director of the 1901 season, and, according to Aviñoa, the musical director of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, understanding both enterprises as a sole project that moves towards the same direction.

Therefore, the key elements that structure this narrative are: 1) the temporal continuity of the movement through the different companies that are established in Barcelona; 2) the unity of Catalan nationalism with its intellectuals and artists working towards the same ideological goal; 3) the preeminence of Enric Morera as the main leading figure throughout the whole process. These points, though, need to be revisited if we take into consideration further research and deeper documentation of the repertoire.

Almost four decades later, this publication remains the primary bibliographic reference on the Catalan lyric theater movement, even though there is now much more information available, both in digitalized newspaper collections and in personal collections deposited in public archives. Particularly noteworthy is the 2005 donation of Enric Morera's personal fonds to the Biblioteca de Catalunya[7], which makes it possible to access the author's unpublished personal documents and scores. Similarly, on the theatrical side, the writings of Adrià Gual from his personal collection deposited at the Institut del Teatre, transcribed and edited by Carles Batlle and Enric Gallén in the compilation Teoria escènica[8], offer another theory for understanding the development of Catalan lyric theater, beyond the sole perspective of Morera. Furthermore, the experiences recounted in Gual's memoirs, Mitja vida de teatre[9], provide many clues, given his extensive collaboration with the lyric project.

The case of Enric Morera is indeed remarkable. He is one of the very few Catalan composers that wrote music for all the different lyric enterprises and for all kinds of lyric genres. From the very beginning of the movement, he continued writing music for the Catalan stages during his whole career, making it possible to see an evolution and a defined style in his work[10]. However, he was not the only one involved in the movement. Certainly, Morera directed and funded the 1901 and 1922 seasons, but the several projects that took place in between were promoted by different people. The 1903 reprisal of the Teatre Líric Català season was managed by the Foment del Teatre Líric Català association, and the 1910 reprisal was directed by Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, since Morera was at that time touring Argentina. The Espectacles-Audicions Graner were artistically directed by Lluís Graner, with the stage direction in charge of Adrià Gual. Although the press speculated with Morera's name as musical director, he was only an external collaborator, sending his scores to Barcelona for the productions commissioned by Graner while living in Sitges. Therefore, many other names should be put on the table when addressing the leadership of the movement. In fact, it was often in dispute.

It must be considered also that many of these figures were not coming from the field of music. In fact, more dramatic authors were involved in creating new lyric titles than musical composers; what artistic directors found difficult was to find composers to write the music for the librettos they had commissioned. As well, the "total work of art" Modernist premise also brough many painters to the field of lyric theater to explore new artistic limits as stage and light designers given the new possibilities that electrified theaters were offering. Therefore, the national lyric movement in Catalonia cannot be studied singly from a musicological perspective, basing its history on the contributions and biographies of the "great composers".

Theater directors such as Adrià Gual, and even painters that decided to invest in theater and become scenographers, such as Lluís Graner or Joaquim Vancells, were also closely involved in the movement. As artistic directors in charge of promoting the creation of new pieces that formed a modern Catalan repertoire, they were the ones commissioning composers to write music for the pieces they envisioned. If these pieces are studied only as part of the composer's individual career and style, they will look experimental and out of place, making it very difficult to understand the aesthetical motivations of the authors to write them. Such could be the case of the short musical vision La matinada [The sunrise] in Felip Pedrell's catalogue, who pursued the creation of a large-format Hispanic opera and only wrote this piece out of the personal friendship he held with librettist Adrià Gual, later refusing further collaborations to write more musical visions. There are also examples in the dramaturgical field, such as Josep Carner, who wrote many of the librettos under the instructions of painter Lluís Graner with a fixed paid salary[11], while most of his further work is considered Neoclassical poetry. If these figures from the domains of scenography, dramaturgy, and stage direction are introduced in the movement's narrative, the discourse of a unified project for a Catalan lyric theater under the single lead of Enric Morera starts to crackle.

In particular, studies about the figure of Adrià Gual introduce a divergent lyric theater theory and a parallel conception of making lyric theater in Catalan that had been disregarded in the musicological discourse. Works from the field of theater studies point towards the relevance of Gual's "popular theater" theory, who based his musical plays on folk elements, such as songs and myths, in order to modernize culture through the aesthetic renewal of traditional folklore under Symbolist principles. Remarkably, Carles Batlle's study Adrià Gual (1891–1902): per un teatre simbolista[12] following his own PhD dissertation, highlights the synthesis of the arts as a union of music, text, and scenography, the theory of popular theater, and the dramatization of folk song as thought by Adrià Gual. In addition, Anna Solanilla's thesis, L'escenografia simbolista d'Adrià Gual[13], dedicates a chapter to the Symbolic scenography of Blancaflor (1899), with text and stage design by Gual and music by Enric Granados, which was the first attempt to materialize his theory in the realm of lyric theater. The theory of popular theater that Adrià Gual wrote down in 1901 serves to understand his personal production of dramatized folk songs, which Gual begins with Blancaflor (1899), but which extend to Els tres tambors (1906) and La presó de Lleida (1906) produced at Espectacles-Audicions Graner. In fact, it is applicable to the analysis of the company's entire lyric programming because it was the theoretical basis for its predilect genre of "musical visions".

As for Enric Granados, the composer of Blancaflor's music, the most notable study about his work is Mark Larrad's doctoral thesis, The Catalan theater works of Enrique Granados[14], in which he analyzed the composer's theatrical music after discovering the scores for his lyric dramas, which had been thought lost, in France. However, Blancaflor is treated like a minor piece, since it seems the author didn't have access to the full score, now known to be preserved in Adrià Gual's collection at the Institut del Teatre. Walter Aaron Clark revisited Granados's lyric works in the biography Enrique Granados. Poeta del piano[15], not giving further relevance to Blancaflor.

The case of Santiago Rusiñol as a playwright that notably contributed to the movement also following the aesthetics of Symbolism has been studied from a literary perspective in Margarida Casacuberta's PhD dissertation under the title Santiago Rusiñol i el teatre per dins[16], which explains the influence of decadent Symbolism represented by Maeterlinck and the Parisian Théâtre d'Art on Rusiñol's theater. Therefore, we know that Rusiñol's main Symbolist production was lyric dramas for Enric Morera's Catalan operetta company, but little attention has been paid to the musical aspect of these pieces from the musicological field, despite the great public success of some of them, like L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by]. Neither has the impact Symbolism had on the subsequent development of Catalan lyric theater been properly studied after Rusiñol's and Gual's individual contributions. Therefore, it is necessary to re-examine the movement of Catalan lyric theater including theatrical theories that explain its dramaturgical principles, beyond purely musical criteria or potentially biased journalistic criticism. The integration of studies from different disciplines into a single history of Catalan lyric theater is still a pending task.

Despite the significant involvement of multiple authors in Catalan lyric theater, their lyrical works have been studied monographically and have not yet been considered in relation to the rest of the lyrical project or the company in which they participated. For example, Jauma Pahissa's lyric drama Canigó (1910), with text by Josep Carner and stage direction by Adrià Gual, has been studied by Joaquim Rabaseda in his PhD dissertation Jaume Pahissa. Un cas d'anàlisi musical[17] as a singular piece under Wagnerian parameters, not taking into account the evident connection with the Symbolist aesthetics of musical visions all its authors had participated in until recently, as a legacy of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. As well, Àngel Guimerà's contributions to Catalan lyric theater have been studied and analyzed from the perspective of the author's internal dramaturgical evolution[18], without placing them in the business context that commissioned them. The dramaturgical choices made in works like La santa espina or La reina vella [The old queen] can't be understood if not taking into consideration Graner's aesthetics implemented at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, enterprise for which the pieces were commissioned.

If scholar studies about the Espectacles-Audicions Graner and the Sala Mercè are also taken into consideration, the picture becomes even wider. These companies based their productions on Adrià Gual's lyric theory, renaming the genre as "musical visions" as a reference to the materialization on stage of folkloric imagery transmitted orally. Regarding lyric theater at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, La música i el modernisme reconstructs the Principal theater's program, but does not consider the uniqueness of musical visions as a genre of an eminently Symbolist character, nor does it connect these pieces with the repertoire Graner produced concurrently at the Mercè hall, based on the same dramaturgical principles. In fact, there is some confusion when it includes some works premiered at the Mercè hall as part of the Principal's season, such as La dona d'aigua (1905), and some names are mixed up, like that of Rafael Moragas (who wrote some of the first screenplays for Graner's cinematographic productions) with that of the set designer Miquel Moragas[19].

Although it was one of the main institutions dedicated to Catalan lyric theater during the Modernist period, no systematic study has been carried out about the Espectacles-Audicions Graner that accurately documents and analyzes its activity from either an economic or an artistic standpoint. Some studies, such as Clara Beltrán's PhD dissertation on stage set painter Oleguer Junyent, have offered new insights into this enterprise[20], but only tangentially while their main focus was elsewhere. Recent publications on Catalan lyric theater, such as Francesc Cortès chapter in the book La zarzuela, patrimonio de la Hispanidad: crònica cantada de nuestra vida[21], have taken its existence into account and kept it within the current historiographical discourse, but have not delved into the research and analysis of its repertoire.

As for Graner's Sala Mercè, the parent venue of the network dedicated to musical visions, it has been studied mainly as a cinematographer and as an architectonic design made by Gaudí, but the theatrical activity taking place inside has not been properly analyzed further than being a minor attraction. In the architectonical aspect, it's worth noting Antoni González's work on the documentation and virtual reconstruction of Gaudí's Treballs de recerca i restauració del Servei de Patrimoni Arquitectònic Local relacionats amb l'obra de l'arquitecte Antoni Gaudí i Cornet" included in the journal Quaderns científics i tènics de restauració monumental[22].

The main works that have addressed the cinematographic activity of the Sala Mercè are the chapter "Lluís Graner i l'aportació del cinema a l'escenografia teatral" by Xavier Fàbregas in his book Aproximació a la història del teatre català[23], the section on Adrià Gual in M. Concepció Soler's dissertation La sarsuela en el cinema com a imatge del quotidià (1896-1940)[24], and the section on Graner's venues as part of the chapter on cinematograph halls for the bourgeoisie in Luisa Suárez's dissertation El cinema i la construcción d'un públic popular a Barcelona. El cas del Paral·lel[25]. These studies focus on the Mercè hall as a movie theater, and the musical performances staged there have been given little consideration in the overall narrative of Catalan lyric theater. As for the Mercè hall's programming, it has been studied separately from the overall development of Catalan lyric theater and the Principal's offerings, even though the repertoire and artistic direction followed the same aesthetic line as that programmed at the Principal theater by Graner, often even sharing authors and actors. The main publication that has approached it is Joan M. Minguet's article "La «Sala Mercè» de Lluís Graner (1904–1908): un epígon del modernisme?[26]". Nevertheless, even if deeper research was needed to fully document and understand the lyric theater repertoire taking place at these venues, the fact that they promoted the genre of "musical visions" was already put forward to elaborate further connections.

Studies by Jaume Aulet about the Ars-Lucis hall in Terrassa[27] also point towards the performance of musical visions outside the city of Barcelona. Therefore, multiple studies and scholars in the field of performing arts and history of art are tangentially pointing out a unique Symbolist genre that enjoyed a regional network of venues, which had not been properly approached by historical musicology and still lacked systematic cataloguing and documenting. The urge to revisit the Catalan lyric theater movement historiographical narratives becomes evident due to the need to harmonize and synthetize these different genres and institutions into a comprehensive history that considers the existing cultural plurality within this nationalist movement.

These smaller halls and amateur companies that were the main promoters of musical visions across Catalonia bring out another issue in how the story has been told: while historians have focused on the activity of professional companies and dramatic institutions following a top-down approach, smaller venues and amateur companies have been widely left aside, causing an informational void and a geographical bias in favor of the capital city of Barcelona. Several halls dedicated to musical visions that will be addressed in later chapters of this dissertation, like the Saló Gerió in Girona run by Rafael Masó, the Sala Montserrat in Manresa and Marinel·lo's period running the Sala Imperi in Barcelona were completely unknown.

As well, the lyric activity across Catalonia organized by amateur troupes in local cultural centers, which were mainly interested in musical comedies and Catalan zarzuela, remains practically unknown, although the evidence suggests that it had vast dimensions as pointed out in this dissertation on the chapter dedicated to the case study of L'alegria que passa. This research bias in favor of institutional entities has not given a voice to popular and amateur projects, which are clearly necessary to know in order to understand the sociocultural interests and inter-class approaches to the issue of cultural nation-building, in this case through musical theater. This lack of documentation has definitely affected the relevance given to these popular genres within the Catalan lyric theater movement, in favor of the preponderance of institutionalized major genres like opera. Given the nature of the Catalan lyric theater phenomenon as a sociocultural movement, a bottom-up perspective is rather needed to study the ways its development and spread, rather than exclusively focusing on the institutionalized companies.

Another historiographical question at this moment is whether Catalan lyric history should be written based on the repertoire whose documental traces have survived until our days, or if lyric history can be sustained on a large number of lost titles. In the case of the genre of musical visions, most of the documents are lost, since the repertoire was not edited for publication nor deposited in copyright agencies, and the manuscripts mostly remained in private hands, losing their track over time. However, as it will be explained in the following chapters of this dissertation, this genre meant the introduction of modernity in Catalan lyric theater through the importation of European Symbolism, and a whole pedagogical project to promote it as a mass cultural offer for the average audience took place across Catalonia. It also represented an alternative position in the movement, not aligning with the genre of operetta or musical comedies previously promoted by Morera. Therefore, its relevance for understanding the articulation of the lyric movement is evident, even if the sample of texts and scores to analyze is not large.

The majority of the surviving musical visions scores are, actually, those written by Morera for the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Definitely, the fact that Enric Morera's personal archive was deposited in a public institution, providing clear and complete scores of most of his catalogue, has contributed to the hyper-dimensioning of his role figure as the leader of the Catalan lyric movement. However, despite his personal involvement and the enormous effort that he in fact dedicated to promoting Catalan lyric theater, many other authors and artists were also involved in the national lyric movement, providing different points of view on the direction the movement should take and promoting different aesthetic approaches and genres.

Just like many companies were amateur, also many authors were non-professional, especially those composing for the productions outside of the capital city. Therefore, many popular productions were not technically excellent, but the sociocultural value of the projects remains relevant for understanding the sociocultural reality of Catalonia. This opens the question of whether (re)constructing history either based on the public reception and sociocultural impact that these pieces had, even if we have not preserved them or were not technically remarkable, or on the most valuable scores that we know in the present day, even if their reception was ephemeral or they were not even premiered. So far, the latter has been the norm, leaving some of the most remarkable musical successes of the history of Catalan musical theater, such as L'alegria que passa, scholarly unattended from the side of musicology.

Regarding the analysis of the repertoire, preconceptions about the nature of the nationalist movement have also affected its qualitative interpretation. The Catalan lyric repertoire has been studied as if Catalan nationalism was a sole ideology and that all the authors and companies who considered their pieces "Catalan lyric theater" conformed to a unified movement. This led to the assumption that they all worked for the same goals and under the same aesthetic parameters. When this is applied to the study of the repertoire and the attempts to define the characteristics of the national genre, the results are confusing and uneven, not allowing us to define a common style or form. Therefore, the primary conclusions were that the genre of Catalan lyric theater was eclectic, theoretically undefined, and heterogeneous[28]. The movement was seen as a conglomerate of different pieces without apparent similarities, without a clear line of action or style, and without an articulated aesthetic discourse[29].

Since no common musical and dramaturgical characteristics in terms of form or style could be defined after analyzing the preserved repertoire, the historiography of the movement has taken the discourse established in the journal Joventut (1900–1906), which specialized in Catalan literature and arts, as the main aesthetical goal that the movement pursued[30]. The editorial team of this journal defended the importation and influence of Richard Wagner's musical drama as the main resource to imitate in the creation of a national Catalan genre. They stated that Catalan lyric theater should consist of fully-sung operas in three-acts format, using the technique of leitmotiv (in which music and text were connected in meaning as a total work of art) and local medieval mythology as their main source for the plots. However, this theoretical positioning barely reached the stage practice.

The people involved in Joventut did not pass to action and neither wrote nor composed themselves pieces to be staged. The active composers and writers such as Enric Morera and Adrià Gual, and even the artistic directors and owners of the companies such as Lluís Graner, believed that the national genre should be much different from the ideas presented in Joventut. The pieces they staged mostly followed a short format, either because they wanted to compete with Spanish género chico (in one act)[31] or because they were following the aesthetics of Symbolist théâtre d'art inspired by Maurice Maeterlinck[32]. They also alternated between spoken and sung parts, and direct quotes of folk songs used to be included in the music as a way of directly connecting the piece to the national identity[33]. So, when trying to apply the theory shown in Joventut to the actual staged repertoire, a clear mismatch between theory and practice is appreciated.

Taking this theoretical model to evaluate the practical results led to the consideration that the authors were not skilled enough to pull out a whole opera, and that the companies did not have enough funding to produce longer plays. The conditions of the productions have been said to be precarious and improvised since the actors and singers involved would not have rehearsed enough, so they would only include a few musical numbers in each piece following an easy lyric style close to folk songs[34]. This has especially affected perception of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the genre of musical visions, and the seasons of Catalan Lyric Theater directed by Enric Morera in 1901, which have been mostly left out of the scope of interest of musicological research[35].

However, categorizing the repertoire into different genres and accepting the existence of diverse and even opposed ideologies within Catalan nationalism would make it possible to distinguish the different lines of action and genres proposed within the Catalan lyric theater movement. Deeper theoretical research, as could be the later impact of Adrià Gual's theory, would let us interpretate that the production of short-format plays under a lyric style influenced by folk music were actually consciously-made and theoretically-based decisions coming from the direction of the companies, not due to precarious conditions.

Also worth mentioning would be the historiography of zarzuela as a common genre for the whole of Spain. Zarzuela in Catalonia has been mostly researched by Francesc Cortès,[36] and his work includes the movement of Catalan lyric theater as part of the general history of zarzuela[37]. Here, the criteria of form and style have been predominant at a time of grouping different repertories. The aforementioned plays staged in Catalonia shared, sometimes on purpose, a similar format to Castilian zarzuela, and did not differ so much from it nor lasted long enough to be considered a separate genre when speaking of a general history of lyric theater in the country. This perspective, though, omits the ideological point that actually led to the birth of this company dedicated to Catalan lyric theater during Modernism, which was creating a national genre to actually compete and differentiate themselves from Castilian zarzuela.

On the opposite side we can find recent work by Jaume Radigales[38], which proposes the inclusion of the Catalan lyric theater movement as part of the history of Catalan opera. This implies focusing on the ideological intentions of the movement to construct a continued history of national lyric theater in Catalonia, but omitting the formal and stylistic differences between plays and genres that exist within the repertoire of lyric theater and opera written in Catalonia. The historiographical dilemma opened here between these two opposed perspectives would be whether we should write musical history based on the characteristics of the practical results that were on the stage, or if we should give priority to the ideological discourses and intentions behind them.

To solve this conjuncture, the de-nationalization of discourses used to comprehend nationalist movements is advised. Firstly, the concept of segmented pluralism[39], upon which Catalan nationalism would present different ideological branches based on political and religious differences, is useful to broaden the picture and comprehend the existing civic cleavages of society. The different ideological approaches to the national identity also affect how the genres of national culture are projected and conceptualized in the process of nation-building. In fact, the challenge for the nationalist movement is to achieve the cohesion of these different segments around a single national project. The case of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner as a unifier of the different scenic proposals within Catalanism, as a cultural parallel of the Catalanist political coalition Solidaritat Catalana, will be a clear example of this process.

Secondly, the analysis of the repertoire should not look for the uniqueness of a national style, but rather should be focused on the techniques used to "nationalize" the existing international genres and how national variants are established[40]. Discussions about the intrinsic compositional differences that differentiate Catalan operetta from Spanish zarzuela, besides the use of one or another language, have arrived to no clear conclusion. Their differences regarding the international notion of European operetta could also be argued. In the field of opera, the same debate could be established without arriving to determining conclusions. The definition of a Spanish opera or a Catalan opera cannot be established purely in analytical terms of form and style, but rather in the use of the national language and the inclusion of folk quotations.

Instead of creating nationalist narratives that present a forced historical cultural singularity with the political function of legitimating the nation, also forced to search for the continuity of the national tradition despite the severe changes of the artistic forms and styles, another kind of history can be written. The study of cultural nationalist movements can be performed taking into consideration the inner plurality of genres and styles and what discursive elements are used to "nationalize" them, the participation in international trends, the importation and exportation of cultural references, and the inter- and transnational influences.

❖ Thesis statement and objectives

The teatre líric català, or Catalan lyric theater, was not a unified movement, but presented instead different trends within it that are aesthetically and ideologically opposed to each other. The plurality existent in the political field within Catalan nationalism was also present in the cultural scene, shaping a segmented panorama of multiple cultural trends and initiatives. This resulted in the theorization and defense of different genres of musical theater within the Catalan cultural scene to become "the national genre".

A debate between operetta, symbolist musical visions, lyric drama or big-format opera was held mainly on the press, with different sectors positioning either in favor or against each genre according to their moral and aesthetic criteria. Between the different proposals, it is worth noting the particularity of the "musical visions" due to its historiographical invisibilization and its artistic relevance.

Far from being a mere continuation of the initial Teatre Líric Català project (1901–1903) led by Enric Morera to promote Catalan operetta, the opening of the "sala Mercè" or Mercè hall (1904–1910) —dedicated to the staging of musical visions— marked a change led by Lluís Graner in the general trend of the Catalan lyric theater movement, consolidated with his Espectacles-Audicions Graner (1905–1908) hosted at the Principal theater of Barcelona.

The painter Lluís Graner intended to establish and institutionalize the genre of "musical visions" —based on the staging of folk songs and legends under a symbolist and vitalist dramaturgy— as the predilect proposal to become the national genre. Its foundation can be traced back to Adrià Gual's theory of "popular theater" and its materialization as "Catalan folk songs harmonized for the stage".

The genre was based on the combination of poetic texts and music —usually taken from folkloric compilations— with electric lights blending their different colors and special stage effects. The aim was to evoke emotions on the public by the sensorial suggestiveness of the scenery, while modernizing national folklore and making it attractive for the urban public. While the genre kept a modernist shape, influenced by international symbolist trends and avant-gardist dramaturgies, it supposed a conservative impulse on the Catalan Modernist scene that reintroduced traditional content with the quotations of folk songs and tales, as well as religious and Biblical episodes, as symbolic elements that represented the historical nationality.

The success of the Mercè hall led to the creation of a network of venues across Catalonia that followed the same policies of offering moral entertainment to the middle and working classes, including the staging musical visions at the end of the movie sessions. Colleagues of the Barcelonian promoters imported the model inaugurated with the Mercè hall to their corresponding cities, like Rafael Masó and the Saló Gerió in Girona or Joan Llongueras and the Ars-Lucis in Terrassa. On other occasions, Graner helped directly to the settlement of these new halls as a provider and distributor of content, like he did with the Saló Artístic in Sabadell, and in some others, the venues imported the genre of the musical visions on their own initiative, like the Sala Montserrat in Manresa.

The phenomenon of the musical visions was, therefore, not an individual initiative of Lluís Graner, but a broad movement encompassing the whole region of Catalonia. Several cultural intellectuals and professional actors were mobilized, but the network was mainly spread by nationalist activists and amateur companies, as well as civil Catholic associations that provided support hosting multiple of these venues on their buildings.

Between all of the entities that formed the musical visions network, it is worth noting the Espectacles-Audicions Graner for its singularity, as also for being the biggest stage dedicated to the musical visions. Lluís Graner, as its impresario and artistic director, intended that this project was dedicated to the consolidation of the musical visions genre. However, after a first season (1905/06) almost exclusively dedicated to produce musical visions, Graner leaned towards the ongoing political movement of Catalanist unification led by Solidaritat Catalana and opened up the scope of their repertoire, including lyric drama and musical comedies. Along with the extraordinary seasons of spoken theater and musical concerts, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner became —for the few years that the venue was active— the centralized institution for Catalan culture, projecting Lluís Graner as a unifier of the different segments of the cultural nationalist movement.

Consequently, the objectives that this dissertation has set to achieve are:

- To conciliate the diverse historiographical perspectives on the Catalan lyric theater movement through its consideration as a sociocultural nation-building movement involving opposed ideological segments.
- To identify and delineate the different segments of the movement and to define their positioning regarding the national lyric genre.
- To remap the geographical extension of the movement, broadening its borders further than the capital city of Barcelona, through the consideration of provincial and rural cultural initiatives, as well as the amateur companies.
- To abandon the traditional localist perspective in order to examine the transnational connotations of this national-building movement from a comparative point of view with other contemporaneous sub-state national awakenings, while exploring its connections with international European artistic trends.
- To determine the multimodal discursive elements that characterize the repertoire and the ideological and symbolical value that they have in order to "nationalize" or "Catalanize" the repertoire.
- To facilitate the access to materials from the repertoire by editing a selection of pieces that illustrate the arguments and analysis developed on this dissertation.

❖ Structure of the dissertation

This dissertation examines the movement of Catalan lyric theater that took place during the period of Catalan Modernisme, during the last years of the 19th century and the first decades of the 20th. It is, therefore, focused on the history of Catalan musical theater and its historiographical revision. However, it does not intend to merely present a chronological outline of the different events and projects that took place related to the movement. Instead, the purpose of the dissertation is to examine the complexity of how this cultural nationalist awakening was articulated through the theorization and practice of new genres and forms of lyric theater. Hence, the dissertation is not structured as a positivist presentation of events following a chronological order, but rather proposing different topics, analyzing the movement from different theoretical perspectives and applying different concepts and methods to explore the multiple angles that the articulation of a national genre of Catalan lyric theater presented.

The complexity of the movement involves multiple and dissimilar elements. Some are closer to political and social sciences, such as the ideological sociopolitical constructions related to national and cultural identity, the conceptualization of the cultural symbols that represent nationality, or the internal debate on the inter- and trans-nationalization of the movement and the acceptance of external influences. Economical aspects are also present in the business planning and professional networking to arrange the distribution of the repertoire, as well as the purely artistic fields of dramaturgical theorization, musical experimentation, and plastic stage set innovation.

To better understand each of these processes, the different sections and chapters of the thesis will analyze them separately, since different methodological approaches and theoretical concepts are needed to treat each topic. Nevertheless, the narrative will keep coming back to the same companies, authors and remarkable titles that formed the repertoire of Catalan lyric theater in a rhizomatic manner, examining them from different perspectives that complement and build upon each other. Eventually, the reader will have a complete view of the historical outline of events and all the different connotations that they imply, even if the outline of the dissertation is not structured as a chronological story.

The introductory and theoretical framework aims to present a critical historiographical review of how the Catalan lyric theater movement has been studied, introducing what new methodologies could be used to address the movement and its repertoire. In order to do so, the state of the art regarding Catalan lyric theater will be examined and the main studies will be addressed to analyze the different historiographical discourses presented. The goal is to determine in which structural points they base their historical narratives, the methodological steps they followed, and the issues or problematics that they present. An underlaying intention would also be to remark how the different studies contrapose each other's narratives, highlighting the need for a revision of their approaches.

Upon identifying the contradictions surrounding the historiography of Catalan lyric theater, new methodological approaches that have been applied to the study of the movement will be introduced. Preliminary conclusions will be shown to illustrate how the application of diverse methods of discourse analysis are giving new results that help to understand the ideological complexity of the movement, beyond just the formal and stylistic characteristics of the repertoire that previous literature has approached.

The perspective through which the movement is portrayed aims to present Catalan lyric theater as a case study comparable to other contemporaneous ones, given that we can find similar cases across Europe of nationalist awakenings during the fin de siècle and Modernist period[41] in which this proposed methodological approach could also be applied. Similar ideological trends as those seen in Catalonia can be identified in other regions also articulated through the nationalization of musical theater and operatic genres, although the formal and stylistic characteristics could differ. This could point to unexplored ideological connections between nationalist cultural movements across European Modernism, allowing for their common understanding as a transnational movement.

Firstly, part one will approach the Catalan lyric theater movement as a whole, to re-narrate its history and analyze different functioning and theoretical dynamics. Section one is dedicated to provide a general overview of the Catalan lyric theater movement, the different professional companies that were dedicated to stage this repertoire, and the different positionings of the press and intellectuals regarding their artistic preferences to become "the national genre" of lyric theater. These chapters are, therefore, dedicated to reshaping the historiographical narrative of this movement, portrayed by previous literature as a unified movement led singly by Enric Morera, and without a clear aesthetic program. A pluralistic approach will be presented, in which Catalan cultural nationalism is segmented into multiple ideological branches that defend different artistic and identitarian ideals, often in opposition. The different companies and lyric projects will be mapped in relation to their ideological and aesthetic criteria, clarifying the present dynamics of opposition between different segments of cultural Catalanism. Furthermore, the difference between the distribution models of the repertoire will be noted. The opening of an exclusive network of halls used to spread the genre of musical visions will be contraposed to the provision of a repertoire for the already existing zarzuela companies, so they can substitute the repertoire from within the established practice system.

If this first section was focused on an internal examination of the regional activity in Catalonia, section two takes a step back to broaden the view and provide a wider analysis of the Catalan national movement from a supranational perspective. The reception of foreign aesthetic influences, which were intentionally imported to Catalonia during the process of cultural modernization that characterizes the Modernisme period, are analyzed to evaluate their impact on the field of lyric theater. The reception of symbolism through Maeterlinck oeuvre and the imitation of his dramaturgical aesthetics is highlighted, as well as the influence of Wagnerian theories on the theorization of how to renovate musical theater in Catalonia. Ultimately, a transnational approach is provided by a comparative study that faces Catalan national awakening through musical theater with the contemporaneous case of the Lithuanian national revival, presenting several concomitances in the ideological and conceptual processes that are taking place in the respective regions through the spread of national ideals using different genres of musical theater. We can, therefore, conclude that the Catalan movement was not a localist phenomenon, but rather a transnational process that was taking place as well in other sub-state national awakenings, in connection with the contemporary artistic practices that were in trend in Europe.

After a general analysis and historical outline of the Catalan lyric theater movement as a whole, part two will zoom into the specific genre of musical visions. Being probably the most particular initiative given within the movement, musical visions have also been the most widely undernoted genre in the existing literature that approaches the repertoire. Symbolist theater has been widely studied from a uniquely literary perspective, while also some composers and dramaturgs have been monographically approached, but the musical visions as a sole genre had not been approached. Instead, some of the pieces that have been studied as part of an author's repertoire have been considered as dramas with incidental music, instead of properly lyrical dramas conceived as musical theater pieces.

Thus, the dissertation approaches specifically the genre of musical visions, presenting in section three an analysis of the symbolist traits and the symbolic elements of the imagery that characterize the genre, remarking its poetic literary conception. As for the musical content, the topics that are used to signify the pieces will be identified, along with an explanation of how they experiment with musical dramaturgy in the search of a musical continuum through the formal structuration of the scenes through the repetition of musical motifs varying the orchestral and harmonic texture. Another relevant method to achieve this will be the use of rhythmic intonations of the spoken parts accompanied by instrumental music, which work as transitions and intermediary points between the spoken and sung parts. Attention is to be paid also to the plastic designs of the productions, since one of the main intentions of the artist in charge of the direction is to merge the plastic aspects of the pieces into the literary-musical conjunction delving into and furthering the Wagnerian total-art ideal. Visual symbolism implied on the plastic and lighting elements used on stage will become an inseparable part of the signification and construction of the meaning of the pieces.

The final fourth section is ultimately dedicated to identifying and documenting the network of halls and venues destined to program musical visions. From the initial Sala Mercè opened by Lluís Graner and his subsequent project of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater of Barcelona, these chapters will draw the lines that connect these parent companies with the rest of halls that opened across the region of Catalonia imitating the business model and program of the Sala Mercè. The professional colleagues of the artists involved in Graner's project created a network of venues that shared the same artistic vision as Graner, importing the genre of the musical visions and even iterating some of Graner's productions to municipalities such as Terrassa, Sabadell or Girona. As well, several independent venues opened following the example of the Mercè hall to provide short seasons of musical visions in places like Manresa, Olot, Tarragona or Arenys de Mar. A documented administrative and economic analysis of these businesses, as well as their artistic programming, will be provided to determine the distribution model implemented to spread the genre of musical visions, concluding that the Catalan lyric theater movement was undoubtedly a regional movement. Performances took place all across Catalonia, in which all kinds of intellectual and cultural activists participated, involving a variety of institutions that hosted the staging of the repertoire, from amateur halls to professional theaters, even from private houses to Catholic civil associations.

After such a wide overview, covering from a reconfiguration of the historical narrative of the movement to a theoretical analysis of the repertoire and the documentation of its performances, four annexed volumes complete the dissertation. Two catalogues are provided, including extensive and detailed documentation of the operations, programming and reviews of the multiple venues that hosted musical visions. The second volume of the dissertation is fully dedicated to the Espectacles-Audicions Graner hosted at the Principal theater of Barcelona, while the third is dedicated to the network of smaller halls spread across the region destined to produce musical visions. It's worth remarking that all the press quotes cited in this first volume, which are translated into English, can be found on the original language in the corresponding section of the catalogue volumes.

Since practically no materials have been edited from the repertoire of musical visions, the two consecutive volumes are dedicated to the edition of a selection of texts and scores that illustrate the analysis performed on this monograph. The fourth volume includes the reedition of the collection of librettos originally edited by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, while the fifth volume includes the first edition of the manuscript scores that have survived until our days from the lyric repertoire premiered at the Sala Mercè, Ars-Lucis and Saló Gerió. These volumes are expected to promote and contribute to the recovery of historical intangible cultural heritage, profoundly unattended in the field of lyric theater.

Theoretical framework

❖ A segmented pluralist movement

The sociocultural issue of creating and settling a genre of Catalan lyric theater has been defined in this dissertation as a social movement, which has a deep connotation in the manner in which its study should be carried out. One of the most recent scholar definitions of the term states, according to Batliwala, that: "a movement is a set of people with a shared experience of injustice, who organize themselves to build their collective power and leadership, develop a shared agenda for change, which they pursue through collective action, with some continuity over time. […] For any collective change process to be considered a movement, it must have all these six core characteristics: a set of people with a shared sense of injustice, an organized membership base, leadership from within at multiple levels, a shared political agenda, collective action, and continuity over time[42]".

In the case of study that this dissertation is dedicated to, the people mobilized to form the Catalan lyric theater movement come from the field of Catalan cultural nationalism. Under the perception that foreign genres of musical theater like Castilian zarzuela and Italian opera were occupying Catalan theaters, unable to provide Catalan peoples with a musical repertoire in Catalan language that they could feel recognized with, multiple initiatives started to be developed to solve this issue. They all shared the same goal: creating and settling a national genre of Catalan lyric theater. They gave their cause a name, "teatre líric català", and became conscious activist that promoted the project mainly through the press and cultural journals. However, their projects took different but parallel directions.

An organizational attempt in the form of an association to coordinate their actions took place in 1903 with the creation of Foment del Teatre Líric Català, which had Adrià Gual as its director and theoretical leader of the movement for this period. However, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner tried to agglutinate all the different initiatives and trends within the movement in one single project under the leadership of Lluís Graner between 1905 and 1908. The structuring of the movement usually took shape in the form of short professional seasons, amateur venues, or travelling companies.

The Teatre Líric Català arranged short seasons of operetta under the leadership of Enric Morera, the network led by the Sala Mercè promoted Symbolist musical visions following Catholic and traditionalist values, and multiple other authors wrote and extraordinarily premiered pieces out of lyric seasons. As well, they pressured the Catalan opera house, the Gran Teatre del Liceu, to accept the performance of operas in Catalan language, which only started to be allowed in the 1910s. In 1910, Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe became the visible head of the last attempts of the movement's institutionalization, with the promotion of another short season of Teatre Líric Català and the later opening of a musical visions company in the Sala Imperi along Baldomer Marinel·lo. Therefore, the six parameters that Batliwala set for the consideration of a collectivity as a "movement" are met.

A relevant aspect that other scholars have also remarked on when defining a social movement is the non-institutional aspect. This becomes a key methodological consideration when approaching the documentation and study of the repertoire, since traditional studies have mainly focused on the institutionalized companies and have evaluated the success of the movement according to its economic success and professional settlement. However, the nature of the Catalan lyric theater movement, as multiple definitions asset, does not align with the path of institutionalization as a collective and fluid effort coming from different people in a spontaneous and not rigid organizational structure.

A collective definition given by David A. Snow, Sarah A. Soule, and Hanspeter Kriesi claim that social movements are formed by "collectivities acting with some degree of organization and continuity outside of institutional or organizational channels for the purpose of challenging or defending extant authority, whether it is institutionally or culturally based, in the group, organization, society, culture or world order of which they are a part[43]." Therefore, they move on the margins of the set institutions, and their aim is not to enter and become a part of them but rather to create their alternative networks and spaces of action outside the system that they are defying.

With this in mind, the movement has to be approached by identifying the common goals of this collectivity, who its activist promoters were, and the different levels and layers of organization that it achieved, mostly in the amateur and non-professional field. The goal of the movement was spreading social mobilization to their national-cultural cause, with a strong sociopolitical connotation, instead of only a question of artistic and technical mastery of their pieces. Thus, the evolution and outcome of the movement shall be evaluated under such objectives.

Other scholars had previously pointed to the informal and non-institutional aspect of social movements earlier on. As Giddens defines it, a social movement is "a collective attempt to further a common interest or secure a common goal through structurally informal collective action outside the sphere of established institutions[44]". In McAdam's definition, the scholar points as well to "rational attempts by excluded groups to mobilize sufficient political leverage to advance collective interests through non-institutionalized means[45]".

They are defined as collectivities, groups of people that joined according to a common goal, that informally structure themselves. However, this lack of hierarchical and bureaucratic institutionalization means that they are non-unified. There are no formal ties between them that officially bind them as part of one same movement, thus parallel and differing actions can take place simultaneously, allowing an internal plurality within one same social movement. In the case of the Catalan lyric theater movement, the concept of "segmented pluralism" is useful to explain the internal differences given within the movement.

As defined by Lorwin, "segmented pluralism" relates to the organization of social movements, educational systems, voluntary associations and political parties along the lines of religious and ideological cleavages, coined in an attempt to reconcile this diversity with civic cohesion. It refers to a pluralist social model that recognizes the internal diversity within a society, but also realizing that said society is segmented in the form of associations established along political and religious cleavages. This provokes the coexistence of competing networks of schools, interest groups and leisure time associations along segmented lines[46].

In the contextual case in which the Catalan lyric theater movement takes place, we can observe these cleavages in Catalan society. Although Catalan nationalism looked for the civic cohesion of society and intended to be a unified movement, there were clear religious and political differences within nationalist ideology that caused a segmented panorama. One of the clearest divisions took place in the religious field between Catholic and anticlerical Catalanists. Artists' associations presented Catholic secessions, like the Cercle Artístic de Sant Lluc for Catholic painters, while the Modernist movement and the group of intellectuals gathered in Sitges was mostly anticlerical. Civil society keen to the Catalan cause grouped in either republican or traditionalist centers, radically opposed political ideologies given within Catalan nationalism.

When looking at the lyric theater movement, these same cleavages are present. The nationalist activists and dedicated people that joined the lyric movement tried to structure it through the segmented networks they were affiliated with, but at the same time uniting in the same pluralist movement. This creates a panorama in which mainly associations from both Catholic traditionalist and anticlerical republican positions worked within the nationalist movement towards the same cultural goal, but opposing and even confronting each other.

The genre of musical visions (the staging of folk songs and medieval legends from Catalan folklore) was mostly performed in a network of venues that was supported by Catholic institutions. The moral center of Girona, the Catholic center of Arenys de Mar and the Catholics' Association of Sabadell, among others, hosted companies of musical visions. On the other hand, Catalan operetta (a comic genre depicting rural traditions and customs of contemporary people aimed at entertaining the masses), was promoted by a network of leftist artists keen on the workers' movement like Enric Morera and Ignasi Iglésias. The journals and different press media keen on each ideology gave strong support to one genre and despised the other, as it will be further analyzed in chapter 2.

❖ Sub-state ethno-linguistic nationalism

As was initially mentioned, Catalan lyric theater was a movement led by the nationalist intellectuals in Catalonia. Therefore, the principles of Catalan nationalism should be defined. The theoretical discourse presented by Catalan intellectuals (such as Prat de la Riba) at the time would legitimate the continuity of the nation based on the preservation of their symbols throughout time, which could fit into the ethno-symbolic definitions of nationalism[47] and into Anthony Smith's consideration about the will of a population to constitute a nation shaped by their pre-existing myths and symbols[48]. The main claim of Catalan nationalism was their linguistic particularity as a key symbol and the right to use and consider Catalan as a language with full rights[49], making it a case of ethno-linguistic nationalism.

However, once we study the reality of Catalan nationalist Modernism, these theories do not allow us to wholly understand the complexity and diversity of the movement. Cultural activists in Catalonia publicly debated between them, sometimes even aggressively in the press[50], regarding which should be the symbols and ethical values upon which they should construct the national culture. For example, the acceptance or not of the Islamic past of the peninsula and its Oriental influence was debated[51]. Henceforth, we can observe how the definition and shaping of the nationality was consciously constructed. There was not a single unified vision of the nation based on the past, but an intentional pick of historical elements in order to construct national narratives according to the ideological positionings of the individual intellectuals. For this reason, we have to speak of Catalan nationalism as a plural movement, since we can find several narratives within the ideology.

This vision would mostly fall into Michael Freeden's postulates of nationalism as a thin ideology that would have to be incorporated into fully fledged ideologies that would work as hosts[52]. This means that nationalism would have to adapt and consequently also reshape these thick host ideologies[53]. As for the Catalan case, we can clearly see different sectors of the nationalist spectrum that politically rely on socialism, republicanism, anarchism, regionalism, monarchism, etc.[54], and even on ethically opposed positionings such as Catholic traditionalism, modernity, developmentalism, or anticlericalism. Therefore, nationalism would mostly be a side ideology to these major political and ethic views. This would explain why Catalan cultural nationalism was such a divided movement under Modernism, and why there were so many confronted visions of nationality and how it should be artistically represented.

Another relevant aspect to remark to properly understand the awakening nationalism in Catalonia is its sub-state nature[55], which actually helps explain why it took the shape of a non-institutionalized sociocultural movement. Catalonia was a region integrated into a larger imperial state that developed a nationalist cultural awakening at odds with the national identity that the imperial state sought to homogenize. Therefore, Catalan nationalism opposed Castilian identity. Contemporaneous journals such as Les annales des nationalités, which were the first European initiatives dedicated to the international divulgation and support to repressed nationalist movements in the continent, considered the Catalan national movement as one of the active European sub-state nationalisms. Between 1913 and 1916, we can find multiple issues on the Catalan political situations regarding their national recognition.

It's national claim was mostly based on shared linguistic and cultural traits —their own national language and common folklore that was specific to the region— as well as in historical memories of independence, with their own legal and nobiliary structures that legitimized the recovery of autonomy. Catalonia was integrated into the Kingdom of Castile in 1714 after the War of Spanish Succession between Habsburg and Bourbon claimants to the throne. The memory of the Crown of Aragon and its independent institutions provided Catalanism with a historical legitimation for recovering autonomous governance. Yet, the movement also displayed traits of civic nationalism through the activist will to mobilize and structure civil associations to promote and establish a new national culture.

Being language one of the main defining elements of national identity, it's worth noting as characteristic of Catalan society linguistic diglossia and class connotations attached to language use. There is a process of substitution of Catalan language, displaced by the main "language of culture", reducing it to a "peasant language" with decreasing urban and administrative presence. In Catalonia, Spanish was promoted in education by the state, and used by elites. Whether these restrictions were more or less severe throughout time, they had direct effects on cultural offerings: theaters in Catalonia were filled with Spanish zarzuelas and touring Spanish companies[56], while Catalan language was relegated to folk and amateur culture and rural environments. Between 1870 and 1890, the revindication of the cultural use of the Catalan language became increasingly public through the theatrical works of writers such as Jacint Verdaguer, Àngel Guimerà, and Narcís Oller.

It will be during the period of Catalan Modernisme, the regional variant of the international Art Nouveau movement spanning the 1890s to the early 1920s, when a strong cultural mobilization took place to create Catalan national styles in different fields of art. Musical theater became of particular importance, viewed as the "total art" uniting all disciplines[57]. Providing people with a repertoire of musical theater in Catalan so that they would not have to consume exclusively Spanish zarzuela, as well as modernizing Catalan rural folklore for performance in the cities, were central tasks for cultural activists in order to familiarize the population of industrial centers with Catalan language and folklore. The politization of the nationalist movement eventually achieved in 1914 the creation of the Commonwealth of Catalonia (Mancomunitat de Catalunya), the first administrative entity within the Kingdom of Spain that recognized the union of the four Catalan provinces until its dismantling in 1925 under the military dictatorship of Primo de Rivera.

It was, therefore, a process of bottom-up nation building[58], promoted by individuals that gathered and associated in the form of sociocultural movements to promote Catalan culture and language, and revindicate the present existence of a Catalan nationality. Projects within the nationalist spectrum, like the creation of a genre of Catalan lyric theater, were promoted by activist artists that, without the involvement of official institutions, tried to either create their own ones, or to act in the amateur field, involving people in their cause through cultural pedagogical projects. The fact that it was a sub-state nationalist movement definitively affected this approach, since they had to oppose official discourses and institutions, using their own means to promote their standpoints. In this process, they were not looking for economic benefit while creating new cultural products or producing new shows. Instead, their aim was to build up symbolic capital for the national movement[59], creating symbolic references for the popular shared imagery that would lay the foundations of a Catalan national culture. Many of the artists involved actually dedicated their personal fortunes to fund some of this projects in an activist move destined to bring people to their ideological cause.

❖ Transnational comparison

The idea of creating common frameworks to understand nationalism across Europe has already been identified as a pending historiographical necessity. One of the classic distinctions in the study of nationalisms is the division between "civic" nationalisms in Western Europe and "ethnic" nationalisms in Eastern Europe, based on the supposed nature of these societies. Scholars such as Xosé Núñez have worked to dismantle this binary, showing that the elements of both types can be found throughout Europe[60].

There are shared ideas, political concepts, theories of social implementation, and processes for creating cultural symbols, as well as bidirectional ideological transfers between nationalist movements in Western and Eastern Europe, including shared strategies of action and implementation of their programs[61]. The differences in the development of nationalist movements depend on the sociocultural and economic conditions, and the geopolitical context in which they developed, but not on their nature, nor as a consequence of a structural determination[62]. It therefore remains a pending subject in European historiography to create a common framework for understanding nationalisms across Europe. As Anne-Marie Thiesse has stated, "there's nothing more international than nationalism[63]".

Chapter 6 of this dissertation compares two cases of national awakening, one from each corner of Europe, and shows how both movements present cultural and linguistic characteristics that they regarded as the intrinsic essence of the nation, as well as a strong civic and activist effort to bring their communities together and promote group consciousness. Consider the persistent initiatives of Mikas Petrauskas, who sought to establish amateur choirs and stage operettas, followed by social dances and parties, so that Lithuanians could gather and engage in cultural activity, creating a sense of belonging:

> "If Lithuanians in America are still Lithuanians today, it is only thanks to a group of good compatriots. Some are journalists, others create schools, publish articles, create all kinds of societies, establish theater troupes, form orchestras. The most important thing is the choirs, music fireplaces. I stayed in America for 17 years at various intervals and taught music privately and in choirs to more than 4,000 people[64]".

Similarly, Catalan artists such as Enric Morera and Lluís Graner became empresarios in Barcelona, investing their own savings to produce shows in the Catalan language for middle- and working-class audiences, with the intention of making high-quality culture in Catalan accessible[65]. Not only do we see the presence of a shared language and cultural tradition here, but also the emergence of a wide network of civil associations and activists dedicated to promoting national culture and fueling a sense of national belonging.

When designing such a study, scholars recommend performing a synchronic comparison of different nationalisms —studying nationalist movements that unfolded simultaneously to assess whether contextual differences under the same global paradigm produced divergent outcomes[66]. It is also advised to compare nations that are geographically distant or lack obvious ties. Thus far, historiography has focused mainly on single case studies, with a prevalence of the nation-state as the analytical frame[67].

The few cases that establish comparative models examine neighboring countries or mesoregions with linguistic similarities (e.g., Spain/Portugal or Lithuania/Latvia). Very few have explored transnational comparisons[68] such as Catalonia/Lithuania. Núñez points out that the comparisons that have reached successful conclusions are those focused on resolving a specific problem through a mid-range theory, rather than addressing broad problems across large territories seeking general theories. The task that remains, in both history and related cultural disciplines that deal with national(ist) topics, is to determine which are the parameters that should be considered when studying different cases within a single framework[69].

It is important to emphasize that what is going to be examined here is not an "international" process but a "transnational" one, since we are speaking of nations that underwent the same process, but being independent from each other, not sharing direct contact or influences. "International" would apply, for example, to Italian opera, which encompasses a specific repertoire, style, and dramaturgy consciously exported and imitated in other regions that recognize and praise the external influence coming from another nation. By contrast, we are speaking here of a transnational process in which different nations independently generated similar discourses about which of their linguistic and cultural elements represented national identity and how to portray them in musical theater, without consciously imitating or being inspired by foreign influences. In seeking national uniqueness, they followed common patterns, which we can consider transnational.

We should aim, then, to develop a mid-range theory that allows us to group together cases following similar patterns and to study them as a shared transnational process rather than as isolated examples. The comparison proposed in this dissertation seeks to determine which are the shared characteristics of both cultural nationalist awakenings. While stylistic differences may exist in the music and texts, or while companies and theaters may have faced different outcomes depending on the contextual circumstances of each region, both cases present shared discourses on building a national culture through musical theater. The aim is to define the framework of operation and the outline of tendencies that emerged in these parallel processes.

Methodology

Once our vision of the Catalan nationalist movement has been defined, we can start addressing how its cultural agenda has been materialized. An initial premise to comprehend the understanding of this process is Carpentier's discursive-material knot[70]. According to it, the discourse and the material are inextricably entangled. Once cannot understand one without the other, as they constantly constitute and influence each other. Therefore, the sociocultural initiatives of Catalanist activists cannot be understood without encompassing in the analysis the ideological discourses of nationalism that prompted their actions, as well as discourses on cultural nationalism cannot be understood without analyzing the results brought to the stage to materialize the so-desired modern national culture.

The methodological proposal stated here is based on critical discourse analysis applied to the discussions and criticism about lyric theater during the Modernist period (1897–1923) and multimodal analysis applied to the actual works that make up the repertoire of musical visions, aiming at determining four goals:

1) the aesthetic discourse of each journal and the artistic theory and proposals in which they can be grouped;

2) the ideology of the authors and activists implicated in the movement and the relations between groups;

3) the theaters and companies that represented the repertoire and what kind of genre or style they defended as their ideal to become "the national genre";

4) the symbols, techniques, and intertextual references that each genre or style of lyric theater uses in order to represent the nationality and relate itself to the Catalan identity.

This proposal aims to reconstruct the actual listing of premieres to understand the real impact and reception of the repertoire in society, instead of only studying the pieces that have survived in the archives. For this task, the study of the historical press is essential, since it contains not only the information to document the plays and theaters, but also reviews and critiques about them that usually explain how a play was dramaturgically developed and staged, as well as personal and editorial opinions, often regarding its adequateness to represent the Catalan nation. Reviews and mentions to the pieces included in the studied repertoire have been found in more than 30 different journals, providing a sample that is big enough to analyze the whole cultural scene.

Furthermore, the documented pieces will be analyzed through a multimodal discursive approach that takes into account the modal nature of lyric theater as a merge of words, music and visual elements that construct meaning while interrelating altogether. The most relevant elements that make up the imagery of the musical visions genre are to be identified, as well as the musical topics that are interrelated to the rest of visual and theatrical elements. Lastly, intertextual references, especially to folklore and mythology, are to be considered as cultural elements that symbolically represent and claim an intrinsic belonging to Catalan national identity.

❖ Critical discourse analysis

The tools of Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA) have been used to categorize the different trends and ideologies that each journal supports, analyzing how language in periodicals and critiques constructs ideological and cultural meanings around productions, while focusing on the representation of social actors, the ways agency is attributed, and how actions or events are assessed.[71] Drawing on Fairclough's three-dimensional framework[72], textual analysis is first conducted, focusing here mainly on the lexical choices to identify some key terms that determine the aesthetic interest of each journal and what kind of elements they look for or value in a piece.

The printed press in the form of journals and newspapers are the main texts we find expressing opinions regarding how the national lyric genre should be. However, to address the study of the companies and theaters, not only textual elements from reviews in the press should be taken into consideration, but also the advertising and promotional materials like logos, flyers, playbills, posters and all other advertisement and artistic materials that the companies produced, even the architectural design of the theaters built for them.

The aim here would be to identify who is behind the productions, what their motivations are, who their target audience is, and what kind of message are they trying to spread. The most interesting case in this matter are the musical visions, which had a very elaborate branding process around them, and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, for whose company a very thoughtful public image was spread.

For instance, the venues that formed the network of halls dedicated to the genre of musical visions, such as the Sala Mercè in Barcelona[73], Ars-Lucis in Terrassa[74] and the Saló Gerió in Girona, used local symbols to brand their identities and relate them to the territorial identity. The Sala Mercè [Mercè hall] takes its name from the patroness Virgin of the city of Barcelona, and its logo included the cross from the city's shield. In the case of the Saló Gerió [Geryon hall], it takes its name from the giant that appears on the foundational myth of the city of Girona.

Next, discursive practice analysis focuses on the process of which the text is produced and received. The situational context in which the texts are created and divulgated is the essential key in this step to determine how the contextual conditions and intertextual references influence the interpretation of the discourse. It reveals how institutional power, professional norms, and cultural hierarchies shape the production of meaning, moving beyond textual features to interrogate how texts are produced, circulated, and consumed as social practices[75]. By mapping these practices, CDA exposes how lyric theater's historical record is not a neutral archive but a mediated construct, shaped by the vested interests of publishers, critics' social positions, and the ideological imperatives of the impresarios and artistic directors.

In this case, the process of cultural nation-building that is taking place has to be considered. The discourses about the new genre of national lyric theater are being developed in a context of national self-determination against the historical predomination of foreign influences in the region, and as part of an internal ideological dispute within Catalanism regarding how the national identity should be shaped in modern times.

This contextual political situation provides the key to interpretate the artistic critiques to lyric theater. They are not only judging a specific piece, but contrasting it against their own ideological view of how the national genre should be while it is being shaped by different authors and companies. By identifying the writers of the reviews and categorizing the different journals according to the discourses they publicly presented according to the textual analysis performed, we construct webs of people that pursued the same aesthetical goals. Thereby, the plurality of proposals within Catalanism regarding the issue of national lyric theater can be identified through the analysis of press.

The categories in which the editorial lines of the press have been classified are:

- Illustrated journals such as La ilustració catalana, La ilustración artística or Catalunya artística that mostly supported a highly artistic lyric theater in terms of visual quality in their scenographic display and the wardrobe, but were available economically and intellectually for the popular middle-low classes, and quite often using the terms "artistic", "suggestive" and "popular". They held in high value the genre of the musical visions, staged usually by directors that were actually professional painters.

- Religious journals such as La Academia Calasancia, La Cruz or La hormiga de oro, which had the aim of constituting a national genre of lyric theater based on censured Catholic moral values, were especially aimed at families with children. They mostly used the terms "moral", and "immoral", and talked about "values" and the reinforcement of “good” or “bad habits”. They almost exclusively supported the genre of the musical visions.

- Cultural magazines such as La Escena catalana, Garba, or Catalunya, which valued a genre of theater with forwardly explained plots and actions developed throughout the narrative line, opposed to the suggestiveness and mysticism of symbolism. The term “action” was very present as its “development” was the main part of the play to evaluate, and they also focused on the formal aspects of the play, mentioning how many “acts” or “scenes” it had and the action taking place in each one. Their support was more diversified, but they especially liked naturalism, and romantic and realistic drama.

- Comic and satiric magazines, with Cu-cut! as the main example of this category, supported comedy and popular genres. They mostly valued imported comic pieces such as translated vaudeville and French comedies, and pieces including dancing music, usually with American and jazz influences, such as the cake-walk. They mostly comment on the “comic” aspects of the plays, their “jokes”, and the “laughs”, “applauses”, and “smiles” from the public.

- Journals were positioned in an orthodox Modernism, in which we can include Joventut, Art jove or Catalònia. These have Richard Wagner’s musical drama as the main example to imitate and only support a genre of wholly-sung “opera”, in a big “three-act format”, using the “leitmotiv” technique and based on the “total work of art” theories.

As mentioned in the literature review section, only this last trend shown in the press was taken into consideration for the current narratives that have tried to explain and historically structure the movement of Catalan lyric theater. We can see here that the aesthetical spectrum of ideas and artistic requirements in the genre that had to become “the national genre” was quite diversified.

Analyzing the discursive practice, we can also establish professional or personal friendships that would help us understand particular events or collaborations. For example, we can only explain the participation of Felip Pedrell in the Espectacles-Audicions Graner through the friendships he had with Adrià Gual, a close collaborator of the company, since the personal discourse he defended regarding how the national genre should be did not align with that of the musical visions.

Finally, sociohistorical analysis connects these discourses to broader ideologies, interrogating how these discourses reflect, reinforce, or resist the dominant ideologies of their time. This dimension moves beyond textual and discursive practices to situate reception within broader historical power structures, cultural movements, and identity politics. This approach uncovers the press’ role in legitimizing or challenging musical theater’s cultural politics and illuminates how reception history is not neutral but a contested site of meaning-making, concluding that musical theater functions as a battleground for social meaning, where reviews act as ideological artifacts. Reviews never merely "describe" musicals but reinscribe their social meanings through institutionalized storytelling.

Once identified and categorized the different proposals in the previous step, they can be now linked to ideological movements. They do not rely only on different artistic criteria, but each category can be linked to either religious activism or political ideologies like traditionalism, republicanism or socialism, each one adopting a genre as their preferred proposal. Therefore, the plural panorama can be interpreted as segmented.

For example, the musical visions were a very particular genre of symbolist lyric theater based on folkloric and biblical intertextual references created by Lluís Graner after Gual's theoretical foundations. When looking at the specific case of Graner and his close collaborators, we realize that everyone in his networking web (which included Josep Carner, Modest Urgell, Rafael Masó, Antoni Gaudí, Joaquim Vancells…) shared the same vision of Catalan nationality founded on traditionalist and Catholic values. All of them were members of the Saint Lluc Artists' Circle, a Catholic artists' association in which those values were shared as the main ideology[76]. Thus, the lyric genre of their musical visions was being spread as an ideological tool between those who shared the same vision of nationality. The political connotations of the genre were not merely casual, but were objectively intentional on behalf of the people investing in the productions.

The political influence of the coalition Solidaritat Catalana as the unifier of Catalanism also affects the articulation of cultural enterprises. The Espectacles-Audicions Graner also had during its first season a strong interest in producing musical visions to establish them as the main Catalan lyric genre, but they soon changed their discourse to establish themselves as the central meeting point for nationalist intellectuals. The company intentionally avoided having a political position, although its director was clearly political. They eventually included in their program pieces from all the different genres and styles that were being proposed to become the national genre, from musical comedy to full-scale opera, as their intention was to unify the community under the same roof. They showed their adherence to the Catalan national cause through the public use of the flag and defense of the language, but from a neutral political standpoint.

The nature of lyric theater requires an approach that can study its different means of expression (text, music and visual design) not only separately but specifically analyzing the interrelations between them and how they were used and artistically thought out as complementary to each other to construct together a specific significance. Therefore, analytical methodologies that study separately these elements will be discarded in favor of a multimodal approach that studies each lyric piece as a single object of analysis, instead of artificially dissecting it into three different parameters. Multimodal Discourse Analysis (MDA) provides a robust framework for examining how meaning is constructed in musical theater through the interplay of multiple communicative modes: music, lyrics, staging, gesture, costume, lighting, and set design.

Building upon a foundation in social semiotics, which frames all communicative acts as socially constructed systems of meaning, MDA extends linguistic discourse analysis to account for the layered signification produced by the interaction of diverse semiotic resources[77]. This approach conceptualizes the musical theater text —encompassing performance, script, and score— as a syncretic whole where layered signification emerges from the dynamic interaction of multiple modes. These include aural (melody, timbre, rhythm), linguistic (lyrics, dialogue), and visual (blocking, costume, lighting) systems[78]. Central to this analytical paradigm is the examination of intermodal relations, investigating how these distinct modalities reinforce, contradict, or complement one another to encode ideology and construct identity. Consequently, meaning is not merely additive but is produced through the specific convergences and tensions between different elements. Therefore, lyric theater is understood as a complex semiotic ensemble where meaning is socially produced through multimodal design.

This is based on a preliminary cataloguing of the repertoire and a process of documenting both the literary, musical, and visual materials that make up the pieces to be analyzed, as well as its reception and criticism in the press. These works will undergo a process of multimodal content analysis using qualitative methods, which will ultimately allow us to make quantitative generalizations applicable to the musical visions genre as a whole. To this end, each literary text is taken as a unit of analysis in search of lexical elements that define or determine the recurring and characteristic objects that make up the imagery that the musical visions recreate on stage.

Consecutively, other semiotic elements that interact with the textual ones are analyzed. Taking into consideration the multimedia nature of lyric theater, a multimodal approach would also require paying attention to the visual imagery that is being portrayed on stage, especially if we keep in mind that many producers and artistic directors were professional painters. Scenographic and lighting elements will therefore receive special attention.

Analyzing the scenic imagery of musical visions involves evaluating what content forms the basis of their composition, which elements recur to the point of becoming characteristic of the genre, what symbolic functions they perform, and what value they have or convey to the viewer. In other words, musical visions mainly glossed over legends, folk songs, and religious episodes; therefore, emphasis will be placed on defining the symbolic value given to them, the implicit or explicit ideological discourse of these elements, and their affiliation or connection with the movements and concerns of the moment in the political and religious spheres.

As a result, noble characters related to the ancient territorial entities of Catalonia prior to their integration into Castilian institutions and law are identified as characteristic objects of the imagery of legendary visions, in addition to castles and other elements of the medieval landscape that are temporally decontextualized and presented with a timeless significance. On the other hand, religious visions based on biblical episodes or saint characters typically feature Virgin Mary, baby Jesus, and other biblical and saintly figures. Luminous elements symbolically highlight their appearances, and landscapes related to places of worship, such as the monastery of Montserrat or the silhouette of its mountains are recreated on stage. Another common element is the infernal as a representation of moral punishment, including the usual appearance of demons and witches in the works. As well, some of them recreate visions of hell on stage as Catalan folklore depicts it, including for instance the cauldrons of Pere Botero, a popular folk character that inhabits hell according to Catalan fables.

It should also be noted that the elements of the scenic imagery are associated with different musical styles and elements, which leads us to intuit the existence of certain standardized musical topics in the Catalan lyrical theater repertoire, with a strong symbolic meaning associated with them. Developed primarily by Leonard Ratner in 1980 and expanded by scholars like Raymond Monelle, Robert Hatten, and Kofi Agawu, recent trends in musical topics theory have also expanded from its use from Classical music to stage and film music as well[79]. This approach explores how composers use recognizable musical styles, gestures, and genres to evoke associations, emotions, or cultural contexts. By identifying and interpreting musical topoi —such as jazz-infused rhythms evoking urban modernity, waltzes suggesting romance, or march-like anthems signaling heroism— the analysis uncovers how composers use pre-existing musical styles to communicate narrative and dramatic subtext.

Identifying the meaning and ideas that composers were codifying behind the used musical conventions will bridge this semiotic approach with the main discourse theory used for the analysis of musical visions. Intertextuality becomes here of great relevance to understand the symbolic meaning of the incorporated musical conventions: the quotation of folk songs, sardanas, the use of modern urban rhythms… had strong ideological and symbolical value, and their association with other stage elements, also charged of meaning, creates a complex, multimodal message with multilayered symbolic meaning.

When approaching the pieces of the repertoire, a semiotic and intertextual analysis[80] will allow us to identify the key elements used to "nationalize" the plays. If the intention was to consolidate a national genre, although the proposals may aesthetically differ in terms of form and style, it becomes relevant to study the techniques that they used to represent or relate national identity to the used artistic elements. In this sense, quoting folk songs and staging traditional dances, specially sardanas, were the main techniques in common for most of the lyric repertoire. Again, musical visions are the genre that theorizes this connection between national folklore and artistic theory in the most complex and intrinsic way.

Musical visions did not just incidentally nor randomly included folk quotations within a newly made plot. The stories that they took as plots were those being narrated by the song lyrics and in popular tales, including as littles changes as possible. The music for the entire plays also came from the harmonization and orchestration of the folk songs and its variation to adapt to the required feeling the scene should suggest. In the cases of staging tales, legends, or even biblical episodes that didn't have songs associated with them, the musical style would still imitate the folk style. Even the term of musical "visions" came from the materialization on stage of orally transmitted folklore. Also, the use of old Catalan language and medieval visual elements served to make a point of historical legitimation[81]. This way, from its very conception the new genre could not be separated from the national identity of the Catalan people, which it was at the same time reinforcing.

Lastly, findings should be situated within a wider historical and sociocultural discourse. Among the people involved in the musical visions genre, Torras i Bages can be identified as the religious reference regarding the relationship between Catholic spirituality and national identity. As the spiritual leader of the Saint Lluc Artists' Circle, he preached the indivisibly linking of Catholic faith and Catalan identity with his lapidary phrase "Catalonia will be Christian or it will not be". His approach explains why Catholic imagery and biblical episodes were part of the Catalan folklore glossed in musical visions. In the political field, Prat de la Riba's theories on the historical elements that make up Catalan identity can be traced. As he considered, Catalan nationality was based on a common archaic language, the past existence of a Catalan territorial entity preceding the nation-state, and their previous own legal tradition. Therefore, his vision of nationality would explain the emphasis on medievalized settings and the recurrent appearance of Catalan nobility in musical visions.

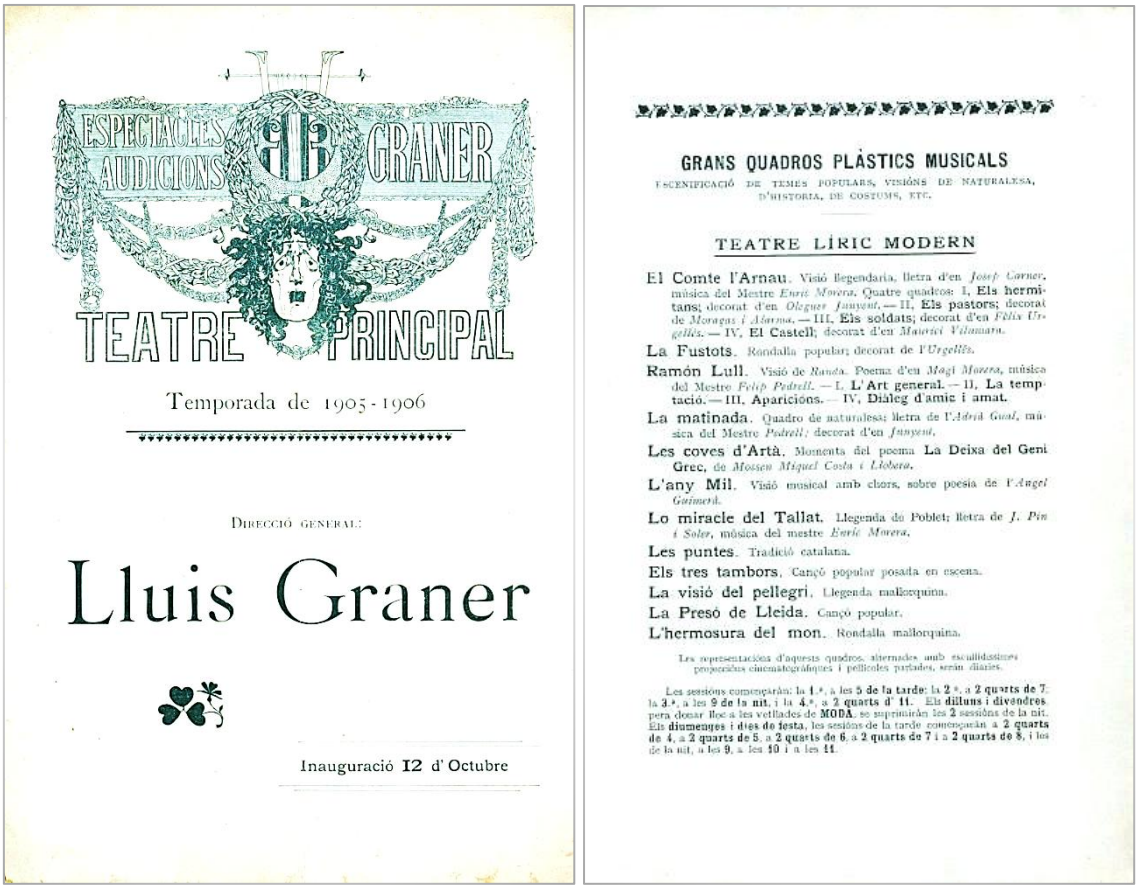
❖ Documentation workplan



The project design calls for an initial stage of pre-cataloguing in a relational database the pieces that constitute the first period of Catalan lyrical theater, as previously identified by preexisting research. The objective is to classify the different theatrical proposals that are being staged within the movement, seen until now as a conglomerate of different trends and genres without outlined order. Deductive analysis has revealed, however, a change in the initial general trend during the years that the Espectacles-Audicions Graner company was active. This change has been overlooked in the history of Catalan lyrical theater and the company has generally been considered as part of a homogeneous project led by Enric Morera. Amidst the relatively generic classifications of "operetta" or "lyric drama", the "musical visions" emerge as a highly distinctive genre within the movement.

Following the establishment of this starting point for the classification of the repertoire, the phase of documenting and cataloguing the Espectacles-Audicions Graner is advanced and completed, due to the role of the company as originator of this change in the general trend. The Sala Mercè, also under the management of Lluís Graner, is aligned with the same artistic vision and is consequently included in this phase of cataloguing. At the same time, a bibliographic study on Adrià Gual, stage director of both scenic spaces and ideologue of the theory of "harmonized folk songs for the scene", is conducted. A close analysis of Adrià Gual's discourses and theories is undertaken in order to determine his previously unacknowledged relationship with the modernist movement of the Catalan lyrical theater. This analysis reveals a correspondence between the idea of "popular theater" as formulated by Adrià Gual and the lyric production of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. His theories will end up being identified as a direct precedent of musical visions.

With the completion of the catalogue of musical visions, the opposite methodological procedure is initiated, employing an inductive approach to verify whether the pieces respond to the previously formulated theory by Adrià Gual. The objective of this phase is twofold: first, to determine the characteristics and stylistic particularities of the pieces in question, and second, to determine whether all of the pieces produced can be understood built on the same dramaturgical principles. Ultimately, it is necessary to verify whether these principles correspond to the theory of "popular theater", and to ascertain which modifications have occurred in the realization of the theoretical concepts of Adrià Gual, as influenced by the commercial direction of Lluís Graner and the contributions of collaborating authors.

In order to prepare the catalogue of musical visions of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the listing of titles performed during its seasons, premiere dates, schedules and number of performances have been extracted mainly from the Diario de Barcelona, which announced daily the sessions of each theater in the city of Barcelona. The listings have been contrasted with the general booklets and playbills of the opening of each season (CDMAE: records 527545, 527553, 528177) and the list of announced pieces that were eventually not premiered has been extracted from the aforementioned documents, while the titles that replaced them have been identified on the press.

Each piece's file contains the following information: the piece's title and subtitle, indicating the number of scenes in which it is divided; the premiere date; the authors of the lyrics, music, and scenography; the location of the text and score in the archive; the cover and bibliographic reference of the edition of the text (when existent). A transcription of stage direction notes from the libretto is also included to facilitate the conception of the scenic space and dramaturgical unfolding of the piece, as well as the drawings and stage photographs that have been preserved. A transcription of the inventory of Lluís Graner in the Principal theater is also provided (Historical Archive of the Hospital de la Santa Creu: CAT AHSCP 01-I.6-02-04.01-7.110), detailing the elements from the scenography of each piece. To conclude, the transcription of a selection of reviews and critiques from newspapers is provided to evaluate its reception[82].

With regard to the scheduling of musical visions at the Sala Mercè, the same procedure has been followed consulting the newspaper library to reconstruct the list of staged titles.

[82] Volumes II and III of this dissertation include the catalogues for both theaters and are preceded by a more detailed explanation of the editorial criteria.

This case, however, is less problematic as it does not alternate different titles on the billboard and it stages only one production at a time. The texts and scores have mostly not been found in the main Catalan archives. Unlike the musical visions of the Principal theater, which were of greater notoriety, the librettos of the shorter and less relevant productions were not published by the company. Nevertheless, transcriptions of the critiques and reviews of the pieces from newspapers and periodicals are included and many contain descriptions of the plots.

In light of the limitations of previous studies, which employed reduced and biased samples of the Modernist press, as previously mentioned in the literature review, it is crucial to extend the sample of newspapers and periodicals. Doing so will allow for the acquisition of a more comprehensive and pluralistic view of theatrical criticism and social reception. Text searching in digital press repositories is essential to identifying which newspapers include critiques of musical visions. Beyond newspapers specialized in performing arts —such as Escena catalana— or dedicated to Modernist arts —such as Joventut—, also newspapers dedicated to the general news, or to religious and political views of diverse ideologies were identified regularly reviewing the productions of musical visions.

So far, the documentation phase has perfected, extended and corrected the pre-cataloguing of both companies started by Xosé Aviñoa[83] and Joan M. Minguet i Batllori[84]. In the present stage, however, the need arises to check whether the genre of musical visions was adopted by other companies, staged in other theaters or even in other cities, a subject still unexamined. Text search in OCR digitized newspapers is once again essential, but now with the added consideration of the territorial scope of each digital repository[85].

The movement of Catalan lyrical theater had been classified as a local phenomenon given in Barcelona. However, a search for regional and local press repositories reveals the implementation of musical visions extending beyond Barcelona, encompassing Terrassa, Sabadell, Reus, Tarragona, Girona, Olot, Manresa, Arenys de Mar, and Vilafranca del Penedès, in addition to sporadic representations located in a multitude of other municipalities, such as Igualada, Figueres, La Bisbal or Ripoll.

Cataloguing and documentation processes are also carried out with the identified halls that presented stable seasons of musical visions. In this process, the entrepreneurs and artists involved in their management are identified and through their biographical study it is sought to establish links or connections between them –whether direct or indirect– that explain the shared interest in implementing the genre of musical visions It is plausible to hypothesize that the halls constituted an interconnected circuit, which was part of a broad network of contacts among artists and intellectuals.

The Ars-Lucis hall in Terrassa was directed by Joaquim Vancells, a painter who was a member of the Saint Lluc Artists' Circle along Lluís Graner. Its most frequent composer was Joan Llongueras, a close friend of Josep Carner, who was himself hired as a permanent literary arranger by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Another relevant personality that was also friends with Carner and Llongueras was Rafael Masó, artistic director of the Gerió hall in Girona. Notably, Masó imitated Gaudí's design of the Mercè hall in Barcelona.

While some initiatives emerged as independent projects, it is also noteworthy that Lluís Graner proactively extended support to other halls that sought his assistance. This included the Artístic hall in Sabadell, to which he generously supplied the productions of the Mercè hall free of charge. Additionally, he provided the Valls hall and the Mercè hall in Arenys de Mar with films that were under Graner's exclusive distribution right.

The initial objective of this thesis was to document and analyze the movement of Catalan lyrical theater in its totality. However, the geographical scope of the identified phenomenon and its dimensions, which were initially unknown, led to the decision to focus this thesis on the genre of musical visions. Practically unexplored, we could actually regard this genre as the most distinct and singular genre in the Catalan lyrical theater movement. The term "musical vision" acquired a sufficiently distinctive connotation in the public consciousness to eventually associate the aesthetics of symbolist theater with this term. A discursive study of the press and criticism indicates that, while other denominations such as "Catalan operetta" or "lyric drama" were interchangeable in public discourse by the term "sarsuela" or "sarsuela catalana", musical visions were totally identifiable as such and were never confused with the zarzuela genre.

Following the identification, cataloging, and documentation of the musical visions and the companies that produced them, we proceed with a discursive analysis of both the companies' advertising materials and the intellectual discourses and scenic theories, as well as the critiques and press reviews. This phase results in the highlighting of the symbolic value of popular folklore, the (inter)national duality of the legend in the Catalan/European context, the low entry prices policies to attract working-class audiences, the religious and moral values implicit in the repertoire, the intention of moralizing society... On an artistical level, the experimentation with stage design using electric colored lights is also noted as a modern technical innovation and as a lure to appeal to a popular audience.

In addition to the press as the main primary source of information, other typologies of documents have been taken into consideration, including playbills, advertising brochures, entry tickets, magazine covers, librettos, postcards picturing the theater and the actors, etc. A comprehensive review of relevant materials was conducted, encompassing both public and private archives and libraries. This included institutions such as the Biblioteca de Catalunya and the TeatreMusical.cat archive[86]. However, it should be noted that a significant proportion of the documents presented in this thesis were found in current circulation within the second-hand market and antique stores. Consequently, a substantial portion of the documentation featured in the thesis catalogs is quoted as preserved in a personal archive.

Moreover, theoretical discourses and treatises can be found in various forms. Some have been published in the press, as evidenced by the essays written by Adrià Gual and the interviews conducted by Enric Morera. Others are found in archives, as exemplified by the Gual collection in the CDMAE. Additionally, some have been edited as publications, including the autobiographies of Enric Morera and Adrià Gual. Lluís Graner, one of the main personalities of our interest, maintained a very low profile on the media, abstaining from public interviews, speeches, or publications, but his correspondence and administrative records relating to the rental agreement of the Principal theater have been preserved in the Historical Archive of the Hospital de la Santa Creu i Sant Pau. Other composers and writers that worked on Catalan lyric theater, such as Felip Pedrell, Àngel Guimerà, Apel·les Mestres or Joan Llongueras keep correspondence on their personal archives —mainly with Lluís Graner— that sheds light on their collaboration and provide useful data for this analysis.

Eventually, the musical visions have been revealed to be part of a sophisticated initiative that suggests a social engineering plan. The genre aims to reintroduce rural folklore to the urban public of the industrial cities, thereby ensuring the continuation of its oral transmission. The promotion of the Catalan language and the morality associated with the purity of the natural spaces depicted in the plays are also a salient feature. By establishing a clear definition of this discourse, we can then juxtapose it with other existing discourses within the Catalan lyrical theater movement. Some of them have been explicitly delineated by composers such as Enric Morera in his autobiography, while others have been identified implicitly through critical reviews in the press, classified by editorial lines according to their positions critiquing musical visions. Consequently, we are confronted with a plural and fragmented panorama, even presenting conflicts between its segments; far from the unitary vision of cultural nationalism presented by the existing bibliography.

A multimodal discursive analysis with an intertextual emphasis is employed in this instance on the musical visions, relying on the few surviving librettos, scores and images. The fact that very few documents have remained is likely attributable to the brief format of the pieces and their internal consumption within a closed circuit of halls, without a prevision for external exploitation by other companies. Consequently, many pieces remained unedited. From the total of preserved texts, most are printed editions (mainly included on the playbills handed out at the theater), while the second main source of other surviving titles are manuscripts that have been preserved among the authors' personal legacies eventually deposited in public archives. Out of 146 catalogued musical visions, the text of 50 of them have been preserved[87]:

- 29 are printed editions of the librettos.
- 3 had been published as poems before being reused for the stage production (La mort de l'escolà, Proleg de "L'Atlàntida", La dona d'aigua).
- 2 are published as novelized versions (La nevada, La pomera).
- 5 are printed as fragments on the press (Dante a les portes de l'infern, La rondalla de l'avi, Sant Jordi matà l'aranya, La filla del rei Arnand, La verge miraclera).
- 11 are handwritten manuscripts.

The case of the scores is analogous regarding the little number of titles preserved. However, while certain musical numbers were exceptionally edited or some reduced fragments for voice and piano printed in the press, most of the preserved scores are manuscripts. Out of the 146 titles, only the music for 41 has been preserved: 17 pieces for orchestra and 27 composed for smaller groups such as quartets or quintets[88]. Of those 41 preserved scores:

- 2 had been printed as concert music that was reused for the theatrical staging (La nit de Nadal, La mort de l'escolà),
- 2 are edited numbers (A song from La cirereta, Ball de les fades from La nina dormida al bosc),
- 3 are printed fragments rearranged for voice and piano (Cançó de les noies from La matinada, Cançó del lladre from La presó de Lleida, medley of La resurrecció de Llàtzer)
- 34 are handwritten manuscripts.

Regarding the graphic documentation of the staging, the majority of images and photographs are derived from the prints published in contemporaneous illustrated journals. Additionally noteworthy are the figurines and drawings from personal collections that are housed in public archives, being of special prominence the Enric Giménez collection and the Apel·les Mestres legacy in the CDMAE. We keep graphic documents of 30 musical visions out of the total 146, all of them from Graner's productions in the Principal theater and the Mercè hall.

With the preceding phase corroborating Adrià Gual's theories as the dramaturgical foundation of the musical visions, a multitude of common characteristics of the genre that had not been explicitly theorized become now evident. The popular songs, legends and tales that are staged are symbolically linked directly to the Catalan identity, as Gual

[87] It's worth noting that also La nit de Nadal had been previously a published poem, but it is reedited as a libretto on the series of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Also L'infant príncep is published as a novel, but the manuscript for the dramatic version is preserved.

[88] It's worth remarking that the musical vision Proleg de "L'Atlàntida" was staged in a reduced version for quartet when the original music was written as an orchestral symphonic poem. As a reversed case, La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta… was written for and played by a quartet, but there's also an orchestrated manuscript that has not been documented as having been used for any full-orchestral production.

foresaw. However, there will appear also a series of intertextual references to the religious world, representing Catholicism as intrinsic to Catalanity, following the precepts of Torras i Bages's doctrine.

Furthermore, the aesthetics of medievalism forge a symbolic connection with the use of an archaic Catalan language, the representation of medieval Catalan nobility and the territorial institutions prior to the annexation by the Castilian crown: the main elements that Prat de la Riba delineated as the essence of Catalan nationality brought to the forefront. Additionally, a series of musical topics is identified, such as modern music of jazz influence associated with malevolent characters (demons, witches, hell...). In contrast, the quotes of folk songs or melodies that imitate the folk singing style are frequently sung by noble characters from the Catalan counties or the Kingdom of Aragon, while angels and religious characters are presented with homophonic, slow and consonant music.

Numerous references concerning European theater and the integration of contemporary Catalan culture within the international context emerge throughout the research. Therefore, a comparative analysis is designed to contrast the process of creating and implementing a musical theater during the national awakening of Catalonia with another contemporary European case of similar characteristics, but belonging to a different geopolitical and cultural sphere. A research stay abroad carried out at the Lithuanian Music and Theater Academy aims to resolve the question of the international scope of this process. A comparison between Catalan and Lithuanian musical theater during the early 20th century reveals that sub-state nationalist awakenings with a similar linguistic claim due to social diglossia present processes and results that are sufficiently similar to be considered within the same historiographical frameworks and understood under a common theory.

A last issue comes to mind though regarding the divulgation of the results. How can we explain what the musical visions were and raise their academical, but also professional and cultural interest, if none of them has been printed, edited or recorded? Consequently, besides this dissertation monographic volume and two catalogues documenting the repertoire, two more volumes are projected including musical visions' edited librettos and scores.

The first volume includes the transcribed and edited series of librettos originally conceived by Lluís Graner for his Espectacles-Audicions Graner, a total of 15 texts that were edited during the three seasons that the company was active in the Principal theater of Barcelona. The series includes mainly musical visions —like the successful El comte l'Arnau or La presó de Lleida—, but also some other comic productions commissioned by Graner such as Les calderes de Pere Botero or Els gendarmes o qui vigila no dorm, serving as an illustrating example of how the company opened up to other genres while keeping the characteristic elements of their imagery. These titles are now compiled and edited keeping the same covers (whose typography was manually designed by professional painters, including Graner himself), small decorative icons and the graphic display of the text inside the pages. However, the orthography and grammar have been slightly corrected to facilitate the reading of the texts by a contemporary reader[89].

The main consideration taken into account was that these texts were meant to be heard out loud; therefore, the orthography has been updated to the current normative only when it did not involve a change in the pronunciation when reading the text. The archaic vocabulary and old grammatical forms have been also kept as they are to preserve the style, since in many cases they were not only a characteristic of the language used at that moment but intentionally used to portray an ancient-sounding language or depicting regional dialects of the Catalan language. However, a process of normalization has been performed when different words, verb conjugations or grammatical constructions appear throughout the text with different spelling, using for all of them the form that appears in the text that is closer to the current normative. This approach aims to preserve the original literary style of the texts, while for other documents of a purely informative nature, like the press reviews transcribed in the catalogues, a higher level of intervention has been applied, since it's been considered that their interest relies on the information that they contain rather than the literary style of the writing.

The second volume of materials is dedicated to the scores of musical visions. The selected pieces come from the Sala Mercè, Saló Gerió and Ars-Lucis halls, as the main venues of Graner's network that coexisted at the same time and shared professional and personal connections. A total of 9 scores are included in this volume: 7 come from productions premiered at the Mercè hall, 1 from the Geryon hall and 1 from the Ars-Lucis hall.

As for the Mercè hall, the volume includes all the original music that was played there whose materials have been found. Titles such as, for instance, Introducció a L'Atlàntida, by Enric Morera, have not been included due to the fact that it was an arrangement of a pervious symphonic poem and not an original musical vision. The same case happens with La mort de l'escolà, since the music used for this musical vision was a previous harmonized song that is already professionally edited for choir; as well as Dante a les portes de l'infern, which reuses music from an existing opera by foreign composer Arrigo Boito. Another case worth mentioning is Sant Ramon, written by Manuel Folch i Torres with music by Fructuós Piqué i Salvat, whose score is indexed at the Arxiu Comarcal del Baix Camp, but cannot be located among the documents of the archive. For these reasons, these musicals visions have not been included in the volume, and the transcription has focused on music for original musical visions.

In the cases of the Geryon and Ars-Lucis halls, only one score has been found from the repertoire of each venue: L'oració de la nit and La lluerna, respectively. As well, Joaquim Vancells libretto for Flors de muntanya was located in his personal collection archived at the Biblioteca de Catalunya. Given the little materials available from each of these halls, the text has been exceptionally included in this volume, even if the score is missing, to provide a brighter insight into the creative activity that took place in these venues.

[89] A fully developed critical framework for the edition of historical librettos is included at the corresponding IV volume of the dissertation.

Multiple drafts and reductions for piano written for the Sala Imperi have been found at the SGAE archive in Barcelona, but they have been left out of this volume due the lack of final scores for the whole ensemble of the hall and the lateness of its activity in the context of the musical visions network. From the venues that offered short seasons of musical visions in other municipalities, like Manresa or Olot, no musical scores have been located. Lastly, it's worth noting that the score of Blancaflor, Gual's first "Catalan folk song harmonized for the stage" with music arranged by Enric Granados, has not been included here either because a professional edition from recent years already exists, edited by Josep Dolcet and published by Ficta in 2017.

As for the editorial criteria taken into consideration, the present edition is limited to fixing necessary copying mistakes and arranging the layout of the staves and measures to a more spacious display. For instance, triplet signs have been included in passages that were written in triplets but only indicated so in the first measures. In other occasions, incidental triplets appeared but were not indicated whatsoever, making the figures within the measure unfit. Added tempos have been included in brackets whenever they were missing and necessary (like, for example, at the start of the score or a new musical number), and Italian standardized words have been included also in brackets in the cases that the indications were written in Catalan. Besides that, no added expressive indications or dynamics that could be useful for an interpretative version have been added. Therefore, the edition provided is an orchestral score including all instruments and voices, with necessary corrections and copying errors fixed, aimed for divulgation and musicological study of the repertoire.

Part I

The Catalan lyric theater movement (1897–1923)

Section I

Historical development, ideological foundations and commercial distribution

Chapter 1:
Revisiting the historical narrative of Catalan lyric theater

Closely linked to the Catalan national awakening of a sub-state, activist, and linguist nature, the Catalan lyric theater movement (1897–1923) sought to theorize and consolidate a national genre of Catalan musical theater to replace the foreign repertoire. The discourse advanced by Catalan intellectuals of this period was based on distancing themselves from the traditional Mediterranean influences that Catalan culture had long received, in order to define their own distinctive style. Castilian zarzuela, Italian opera, and French vaudeville and operetta were common in Catalonia, but Catalanist intellectuals viewed them as foreign influences that prevented Catalan authors from developing a unique genre that could authentically and intrinsically represent Catalan identity[90]. In theorizing what the new genres of Catalan lyric theater should look like, Catalanist critics and thinkers openly rejected these influences, while trying to spark a new popular interest in Germanic and Central European models.

Musical theater was one of the central issues to address by Catalan nationalism, since it was considered, on one hand, the "total art" unifying the artistic disciplines of music, literature, dance, and painting, and, on the other hand, the most popular cultural product of mass consumption at the time. Catalanism thus placed special emphasis on creating and providing popular classes with a repertoire in the Catalan language, one that would also feature on stage the symbolic elements that represented national identity: folk songs and myths, historical legitimation through medievalist aesthetics, and an independent past distinct from Castile evoked through references to the kings and princes of the Crown of Aragon. On account of that, Catalan lyric theater was a consciously conceived movement: they were actively constructing the nation. As Prat de la Riba (1870–1917) explains in La nacionalitat catalana [Catalan nationality][91], the Catalan nation would have been silenced by the Spanish crown during the Modern Ages, but its revival in the 19th century with the Renaixença movement had to be now settled with new forms of national culture that would confirm the continuity of the Catalan national tradition in modern times. Catalan culture needed up-to-date and modern forms of art that were connected to European trends and avant-gardes[92].

Keeping all of the above in mind, the Catalan lyric theater movement was an act of cultural self-determination: on the one hand, the nationalist sector in Catalonia was trying to legitimate their conception of the Catalan people being a modern European nation. They needed their own genre of lyric theater, as other nations already had, such as the aforementioned Spanish zarzuela, Italian opera, or even German singspiel and Wagnerian musical drama, or French opérette and vaudeville. On the other hand, lyric theater was at the time a prominent mass product within the cultural landscape, thereby serving as an effective channel to disseminate their nationalist ideas and beliefs to a large urban audience through an entertaining and appealing product.

From its very beginning, different theoretical approaches were proposed to take the lead of the movement and become "the national genre". As of 1899, the three main genres that would form the movement had already been presented to the public with the premiere of three different inaugural pieces. The operatic genre influenced by Wagnerian theories was introduced with La fada [The fairy] in 1897. In that same year, two more authors started to write other lyric pieces that followed instead the short format, alternating sung and spoken parts. L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by], although conceived as a decadent drama that symbolized the sociocultural issues of Catalan people, came to represent the model of Catalan operetta that Enric Morera (1865–1942) was inspired to promote as a replacement of Castilian zarzuela given its initial success. As for Blancaflor, it presented a folklorist approach to decadent symbolism that, even if initially not too welcomed by the audience, a few years later would be revived by Lluís Graner (1863–1929) as the genre of "musical visions", reconducting the folklorist symbolist genre towards a vitalist direction.

These different genres, theoretically irreconcilable, had different aesthetic goals, were aiming to attract different audiences and were promoted in different circuits of consumption. Their way of including symbolic elements that intrinsically linked the genre to Catalan identity was approached differently, presenting ideological differences on which elements represented the national identity and how they should be portrayed. Therefore, the history of the Catalan lyric theater movement is a story of internal competition within Catalanism, using mainly the press as their battling weapon, to settle one or another genre as "the" Catalan genre, while they all shared the same ultimate goal of attracting Catalan society towards their nationalist political goal of recognizing the Catalan nation.

As will be explained throughout the dissertation, the repertoire of Catalan operetta circulated profusely among amateur and provincial theaters, although the lack of funds to commission new pieces and renew the repertoire as years passed made it difficult for Catalan companies to stick uniquely to it avoiding Castilian titles. The genre of musical visions was promoted by a regional network of venues, mostly funded by painters and with the institutional support of Catholic centers, creating a circuit of halls dedicated uniquely to this lyric genre. As for Catalan opera, although profusely defended by certain Catalanist journals, it was the genre that faced the most difficulties due to its institutional dependence to be programmed by opera houses, in a context in which the Gran Teatre del Liceu preferred foreign international repertoire or Italian translations of original pieces.

Nevertheless, this chapter will focus on identifying the multiple attempts to settle full and stable seasons of Catalan lyric theater, as well as the efforts to institutionalize the movement made by the Teatre Líric Català operetta project and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. The chapter will not only update and add new historical references to the already known history of the movement; its goal actually is to rearticulate the narrative of the movement by presenting it as plural and segmented. After identifying the different projects and visions of how the national genre of Catalan lyric theater should be, the conflicts between the groups that defended each of them will be portrayed. Instead of forcing a unified vision of the movement, the internal battles for its direction and the strategies to take the artistic and professional lead of the lyric institutions will be revealed.

❖ Precedents and foundations (1897–1899)

The beginnings of Modernist Catalan lyric theater occurred in a context of reception and assimilation of diverse dramaturgical proposals. The intellectuals who gathered around the journal L'Avenç viewed the late 19th century as a time of intense ideological and creative activity, believing that continued exposure to diverse influences was necessary to foster renewal and modernization of the Catalan stage. Consequently, they did not limit themselves to defending the establishment of a single concrete trend (such as, for instance, Symbolism) but rather embraced various modern literary movements that opposed Catholic traditionalism[93]. Thus, between 1897 and 1899, three seminal lyrical works that signaled the inception of their respective genres and the subsequent evolution of the lyric movement were conceived: La fada, L'alegria que passa i Blancaflor.

Before composing the music for La fada, Morera had already written music for the theater in previous occasions, especially for the dramatic pieces of his close friend playwright Àngel Guimerà (1845–1924). One of his first musical successes had been the symphonic poem Introducció a L'Atlàntida [Introduction to Atlantis], conceived in 1893 as a musical overture for the poem L'Atlàntida [Atlantis] by renowned writer Jacint Verdaguer (1845–1902). The piece was premiered at the Principal theater on February 24th, 1893, played by the Societat Catalana de Concerts conducted by Antoni Nicolau (1858–1933)[94]. It's worth noting that the symphonic poem will later be arranged as one of the first experimental musical visions at Lluís Graner's Mercè hall, and other texts by Verdaguer will be arranged as short musical plays with music by Morera. As Joaquim Pena considered on his biographical essay about Morera, Introducció a L'Atlàntida was received as a great musical revelation for its melodic fluidity and orchestration structure, denoting already a Wagnerian influence[95].

The success of this piece led Guimerà to ask him for incidental music for his dramas. First, Jesús de Nazaret in 1894, from which the musical accompaniment for the scene of Lazarus's burial was especially praised. Later on, these fragments would be staged as a musical vision at the Principal theater under Graner's production. For the following season, the duo collaborated once for for the dramatic legend Les monges de Sant Aimant [The nuns from Saint Aimant], premiered at the Novetats theater in 1895. After these theatrical experiences, and influenced by his colleague Santiago Rusiñol (1861–1931), who was intensily promoting his Modernist project in Sitges between the Catalan artistic and intellectual circles, Morera wrote his first opera, La fada to be staged at the Modernist Festival organized in Sitges. The score was finished in May 1896, and the piece was premiered at the Prado theater on February 14th, 1897.

- La fada* [The fairy]

La fada was a lyric drama with a libretto by Jaume Massó i Torrents (1863–1943) and music by Enric Morera, considered "the triumph of Nordic ideals now embodied in Catalan culture[96]". It was a one-act opera in Catalan, whose plot was inspired by a legend with fantastic mythological characters.

The poster that Miquel Utrillo (1862–1934) painted for the premiere was very praised in the Modernist context. It presents infrequently long format, said to be inspired by Japanese posters. While the upper and lower part are destined to typographical content, the image of the fairy is located in the center. Underwater elements and creatures populate the inferior margins, while vegetal motifs are used for the upper margins[97].

The play starts with the fairy coming out of the Black lake of Evol, in the Pyrenean region of Noedes, while it belonged to the Aragonese Crown during the 13th century. A shepherd explains to another the creatures that are told to live at the bottom of the lakes in the region, introducing us to the context in which the drama is going to be developed.

Subsequently, Jausbert and Gueralda, a couple of lovers that is running away from their corresponding cities and plans to settle there in the mountains, arrive. As their conversation goes on, the conflict is presented to the audience: their corresponding fathers were enemies and, now that Jausbert's father has passed away, Gueralda's still looks for revenge in young Jausbert. They recall then the moment they met, when they attended the celebrations in Barcelona in honor of the reconquering of Mallorca by Jaume I.

While the couple sleeps, the fairies from the lake wake up and enchant his weapons and armor to not hurt anyone in battle. The fairy claims Jausbert will be for her and not for Gueralda. Later on, they are awakened by the warriors that arrive at the mountain looking for them. Gueralda's father leads them and, in an action scene of a duel against Jausbert, he hurts him to death. They leave his body on a rock to be eaten by the animals and leave, while the fairy comes out to claim Jausbert and bring him into the lake.

Its dramaturgy was based on the principles of Gesamtkunstwerk and Wagnerian musical dramaturgy, presenting a musical continuum without division into numbers or scenes that used the leitmotif technique[98]. According to Aviñoa's musical analysis of the score, Morera's music aims to recreate a mysterious atmosphere using chromatic melodies and orchestral impressionism that would suit the fantastic nature of the characters[99]. Maynés's analysis also points to several Wagnerian influences in Morera's music, like the staggered entrance of the wind instruments at the overture that form Tristan's chord, transposed a semitone below Wagner's original chord, in which Morera would be symbolically positioning himself below the master[100].

The fairy is musically portrayed with accompaniment of short fast notes in all the strings, disturbing the rhythmic stability. Her musical scenes present an ambiguous harmony and chromatic melodies that describe the character as mysterious and hypnotic. Consecutive arpeggios played by the harp would imitate the sound of the moving waters while the fairy comes out to the surface from the bottom of the lake[101]. Conversely, heroic Jausbert is accompanied by metal winds in A major. The theme that characterizes this character is played by the trumpets, trombones and tuba, and it will be reprised when he gets ready to fight once the other warriors arrive at the end of the act. It will be partially reprised again by the oboes while Jausbert dies[102]. As Maynés suggests, Morera would have learned many of these techniques by studying Wagner's scores and the opera would be a Catalan ode to Wagnerism.

The stage design was focused on portraying a suggestive and evoking fantastic place through multiple plastic elements. However, in this search for a mythological illusion, the visual effects turned out formally disproportionate and extravagant in the use of color, which was considered by part of the audience as vulgar in contrast with the poetic tone of the text[103]. The stage director, painter Miquel Utrillo, was exasperated with the results and the use of "extra blue" colors. As Solanilla interpretates, the painters and wardrobe tailors conceptually confused the "ideal" with the "irreal" and searched for the desired fantastic atmosphere through the extravagancy of plastic elements, which resulted in the inverosimilitud of the set[104].

The event was attended by Catalan intellectuals that praised the piece as the inauguration of Modernity in the field of lyric theater, as can be interpreted by the speeches that were read on the occasion[105]. As Ignasi Iglésias mentions in his study about Morera, one of the things that triggered the interest in the piece was that the opera was sung in Catalan language[106]. That was a very unusual fact and a practice that took very long to be relatively normalized, given that even a decade later Morera continued facing issues to premiere new operas in Catalan at the Liceu opera house, which forced their translation into Italian. According to Mark Larrad's chronological listing of Catalan operas, La fada is the first one that can be fully confirmed that was sung in Catalan, since previous ones had been translated into Italian, like Els Pirineus [The Pyrenees] by Felip Pedrell (1841–1992) in 1902[107].

However, La fada was seen as not dramatic enough, which is blamed on the quality of the performance, and the piece was not reprised again[108]. The press reviews were not unanimously in favor either. Part of the Catalan press that did not align with the principles of Modernism aggressively attacked the event, naming Sitges "the Mecca of Modernism" and Rusiñol its "Muhammad", while calling its assistants "neurotics, unbalanced people, hysterics", listening to "music for the sick"[109].

In memoirs and biographical studies from that time, such as those quoted by Iglésias and Pena, the attention dedicated to La fada is actually minimal. Morera himself does not mention the piece in his autobiography, while his Teatre Líric Català seasons and his contribution to the Espectacles-Audicions Graner are approached multiple times[110]. Therefore, although the premiere of La fada was seen at the moment by Catalan Modernists as the inaugural manifesto in the persecution of a national Catalan opera inspired on Germanic and modernizing ideals, its reception and repercussion was very limited. Its mythification as the inaugural and central piece of the Catalan lyric movement took place in recent times through musicological studies focused on legitimating the Wagnerian determining influence on the repertoire.

As Joaquim Pena stated in 1937, it would be Morera's next project for the Sitges Modernist Festival, L'alegria que passa, the one that initiated the idea of setting up a Catalan Lyric Theater season:

> "The extraordinary success that this little piece had, along with the desire of battling the género chico [genre of Spanish comic zarzuelas in one act], which has had such a fateful influence on our people, led Morera to the idea of creating the Catalan Lyric Theater, which has been one of the great ideals of his life[111]".

- L'alegria que passa* [The joy that passes by]

Linked to the reception of the Symbolist movement, L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by] was conceived by Santiago Rusiñol as his first dramatic play. The Catalan painter approached the dramaturgical field for the first time picturing a poetical scene based on his personal experiences when touring rural Catalan lands on a cart along with his friend Ramon Casas (1866–1932). In this piece, Rusiñol depicts a traditional Catalan village in which boredom reigns sovereign. As he describes, "the scene takes place in a lukewarm, vulgar and dull village". Religious chants and working songs float in the air of this "grey town", reinforcing the perception of monotony, continuous repetition and stillness.

Suddenly, it is disrupted by the entrance of an itinerant circus company that arrives on their cart to the town square. Their marches, songs and waltzes bring the joy that the town was missing, inspiring young Joanet to leave the town with them. However, the people from the town would not be willing to pay the company for its performance, since "money is the most sacred thing we have", preferring to keep their money instead of contributing to the renewal of local cultural entertainment. The company would, therefore, leave immediately, condemning the locals to "eternal prose" and "everlasting sadness", with no "taste of poetry". Local Joanet is, eventually, not brave enough to leave with them, accepting "to die of boredom and to not be aware of living" in town.

L'alegria que passa is considered one of the first and most paradigmatic pieces of decadent Symbolism in Catalan theater, in which the local villagers represent "prose" and the circus company is the "poetry". In musical terms, this duality is also reinforced by composer Enric Morera. A syncopated descending motif of three notes ending with a forth ascending note, is used to musically describe the grey town and the music played by its inhabitants. In the initial prelude, this motif opens the piece, and its variations make up the melodies used by the chorus of altar boys and the chorus of workers.

Figure 10: First string measures of the prelude. The main motif can be seen on the horns, while the oboe and clarinets play a melody based on variations of the motif, keeping the initial syncopation and the descending intervals at the end with a final ascension.

The intention was to portray boredom and stillness characteristic of the grey town, for which rhythmic and textural elements are used. These numbers are based on a main melody either sung by the choir or played by one of the instruments, while the rest of the orchestra holds long homophonic chords. The main musical protagonism is given then to the melodies based on the initial motif that outstands over the chords, which are played by the string, wooden winds and a harmonium.

The repeated descending syncopation over the long chords feels as if the motif was making an effort to drag some movement upwards out of the permanent stillness of the chords, as if it was pushing to move forward.

Conversely, the circus company arrives to town with a very contrasting musical character. The main motif from the circus march inverts the movement and is predominantly ascending. The accompaniment is more rhythmic, with permanent short notes off time mainly played by the metals, giving a brighter timbre to these numbers, since the metal winds had been silent until now.

In the final scene, the circus march is played again while the clown declaims his final speech and eventually the music transition again to the initial theme of the grey town with the workers' choir.

Despite some instrumental sections, such as the prelude, most of the music is inserted into the action of the play as verisimilar. In town, the choirs of workers and altar boys can be seen on stage and their musical numbers are part of the realistic soundscape of the village. The instrumentation used to accompany the boys chorus is the harmoinum and the sound should be heard coming from the church on one of the sides of the stage as if it was the organ, which makes an emphasis on this verisimilar perception. As for the circus company, the march, the vals and Zaira's song were all part of their performance, which realistically takes place as part of the action of the play.

This dramaturgical conception to insert musical numbers into the action of the play has made several scholar to interpretate Morera's score as incidental music. However, verisimilitude became one of the key factors to distinguish Catalan lyric theater from Spanish zarzuela. Catalan authors dedicated their efforts to experiment with music dramaturgies that still alternated sung and spoken parts, but without interrupting the development of the dramatic action and creating unrealistic contrasts between the spoken dialogues and the sung numbers.

Verisimilitude is, indeed, a key concept necessary to understand the musical conception of L'alegria que passa, often interpreted by current scholars as merely incidental music.

The introduction of musical moments within the action portrayed by the playwright, instead of being incidental, is rather a dramaturgical choice to create a drama with music that wouldn't disrupt the fluid continuity of the action. This way, the music is mainly introduced as realistically played by the characters, with only a final scene in which the orchestra reprises the musical motif of the circus troupe arrival while the clown recites his final speech before their departure. This technique of motivic reprises will be very characteristic of Morera's musical dramaturgy also in his following pieces for the Catalan lyric theater repertoire, theoretically inspired by the Wagnerian leitmotiv and used to bring structural musical coherence to the plays.

Besides the musical and literary symbols, the contraposed duality between prose and poetry has a further reach, since the piece presents a harsh social critique of art's situation and the social support given to Modernism. Rusiñol and his contemporary colleagues often struggled to receive social support and economical backing, with institutions like the Church constricting their modern views and opposing their disruptive tendencies.

The Catalan bourgeoisie —while Modernist artists considered that it should be their main sponsor— used to invest its profits in the developing housing market of the Eixample neighborhood and showed interest in foreign opera, rather than acting as the economic vehicle for the Catalan artists and culture intellectuals, who always lacked economic support to maintain their initiatives throughout time. The general audience attended comedies and zarzuelas, uninterested in new trends and cultural innovation, while institutions such as the Catholic Church pushed towards the continuity of traditional genres and the imposition of morality in cultural content. Therefore, Modernist trends such as decadent Symbolism received aggressive criticism in the press. Nevertheless, the sociocultural situation described in this short piece resonated with many and L'alegria que passa became one of the greatest public successes of Modernist dramaturgy and Catalan lyric theater[112].

Rusiñol started working in L'alegria que passa in 1897, and the piece was published with a musical reduction for piano and voice written by Morera in 1898. It's first performance in public was staged by the Teatre Íntim company directed by Adrià Gual (1872–1943) on January 16th, 1899. However, during the same winter season, the Teatre Íntim premiered another original title of Catalan lyric theater that materialized a different theoretical approach to the national lyric issue.

[112] The public success and the following productions of L'alegria que passa across Catalonia are further developed in chapter 3.

- Blancaflor

Dating back to 1897 as well, the painter and playwright Adrià Gual conceived the experimental proposal of "popular songs harmonized for the stage" as a staging of Catalan musical folklore, glossing the lyrics and folk songs without significantly altering the original meter or melodic structure. The intention was to reconnect with childhood songs, revive memories and emotions rooted in the land of one's upbringing, all to awaken in the audience a sense of Catalan identity. The material chosen to be the generative and creative seed of this scenic genre, popular folklore, also implied an interconnection with other peoples and their own popular cultures, from a perspective that was both nationalizing and internationalized.

The concept of "popular theater" theorized by Gual —"popular" because of its content drawn from popular folklore and because it was aimed at the people with an educational and moralizing purpose— takes traditional songs and legends, which are glossed or dramatized to be staged, as its creative foundation. This folkloric material undergoes a process of intermediality and intertextuality: the popular songs and legends, of oral tradition, become the basis of a new theatrical spectacle that employs musical, visual, and literary arts[113], which maintains the original folkloric reference to symbolize cultural identity[114]. The idea stems from an idealization of the people and popular culture: the peasant is considered as a catalyzer of the land's spirit when inspired to sing traditional songs in connection with his environment. The traditional song would be a sonic embodiment of the cultural identity of the society that inhabits the land[115].

Legend is conceived as a people's heritage that must be carried on with a pedagogical and social purpose, to keep the popular spirit alive and to impart to it "the goodness, heroism, and beauty" it evokes. The "ever-noble passions" of legends are "the healthiest fortifier of human sentiment" that will keep alive "the spirit of the people themselves" and ensure they have "good, brave, and beautiful children," so that the people "can never die[116]". The timeless nature of legends and myths transcends history, and their literary use allows for the legitimization of the cultural connection between eras. Their belonging to the collective imagination allows an individual author to represent the social imagination of an entire nation[117].

Moreover, traditional songs, tied to the lullaby, have a connection to childhood and draw a parallel between the purity of these musical evocations and the innocence and spiritual clarity of children:

> "When we recall that time, the songs that had fallen asleep awaken; songs we gathered from our mother's own loving lips with a child's ear, still pure of life's overwhelming noises. Today they return to us with a certain majesty as intimate friends, and we discover in them an endless array of subtleties and tenderness [...] just as those notes gradually enter to knock at the very depths of our soul[118]".

In this way, the traditional song, the legend, and children's tales become the three pillars on which Gual's idea of popular theater is built.

In March 1897, concurrently with Rusiñol's writing of L'alegria que passa, Adrià Gual completed the first popular song harmonized for the stage, Blancaflor, as the first example of this theoretical proposal of "popular theater". Gual initially commissioned Isaac Albéniz to write the music, who gladly accepted the request. However, he suddenly had to travel abroad and, since Gual was unable to contact him, he turned to Enric Granados (1867–1916) instead[119].

The work followed the popular folk lyrics of the song and involved orchestrating and harmonizing its melody. The purpose of the piece was to materialize on stage the events going on in the folk song Blancaflor, which explains in its lyrics how a girl called Blancaflor is waiting under the mint tree for her sailor husband to come back. The scene that is developed on stage presents then Blancaflor along other girls sewing under the tree and the sailor, played on the premiere by Adrià Gual, coming into the scene to meet her.

The scene, however, is preceded and concluded with short scenes of present-day villagers heading to work. These are singing the song Blancaflor in a decadent and deadly world, which transforms into a bright and green scene with the mint tree in the middle as the folk song transports you into the ideal world of myths and legends[120]. The musical prelude that the play starts with is based on the repetition of the melody and motifs taken from the folk song, while the villagers sing the different verses of the song, explaining the story of Blancaflor.

Following Mark Larrad's analysis of the variation of the folk song in the orchestrated prelude, "the strongly modal violin tunes set against repetitious strident fifths in the viola suggest that Granados was trying to evoke the simplicity of the original folk legend in his music[121]." There are slight rhythmic and melodic variations to the original melody as it had been compiled in different folk song books, like Aureli Capmany's[122].

"Whereas Capmany begins the tune with an anacrusis, Granados creates a stronger rhythmic effect by starting on the first beat of a 3/4 bar. Although Granados sticks closely to the original melodic structure he varies its strict symmetry by the alteration of the opening phrase, making it an ascending scale […]. However, when the opening phrase is repeated from bar 4 Granados reverts to its original shape. […] Throughout the song Granados creates a more overtly folkish effect by the use of an accented triplet at the ends of each phrase[123]."

The violins and the flute will play the folk melody, while the rest of strings and wind instruments will sustain dramatic chords in, as described by Larrad, "strident fifths", which create a feeling of unease that reinforces the decadent aspect of the scene conceived by Gual of a deadly world in which the mint tree has lost all its leaves.

[120] The stage design conceived by Gual will be further explained according to Anna Solanilla's analysis in the section "The scenic theory of Adrià Gual" in chapter 4.

[123] LARRAD, Mark (1992): The Catalan theater works of Enrique Granados, vol. 1, op. cit., p. 108.

For the first musical moment that is played in the central scene of the play portraying the actual Blancaflor, Granados presents a homophonic texture in which the strings play a joyful melody.

The two following musical numbers start with this new motif and, through a chromatic scale, transition to the initial one taken from the folk song, with the last musical number bringing the audience back to the initial scene in the real world, with the chorus of villagers reprising the folk melody and the same initial orchestral texture.

The piece therefore has a poetic, visual, and symbolic character, with little action taking place that develops any properly dramatic conflict. It's based on contrasting the current decadent reality, both visually and musically, with the ideal world that the folk songs can open to us in our imagination, symbolically portraying the folk song as a healing element of cultural renewal for the people.

The play was premiered "to failure on the night of January 30th, 1899[124]" by the company of the Teatre Íntim, directed by Gual himself at the Líric Theater in Barcelona, preceded by Interior, a Catalan translation of Maurice Maeterlinck's play, which had clearly inspired the symbolist poetics of Gual's theater. The music was conducted on opening night by Granados himself[125].

Given that this Symbolist production was not well received by the audience, the project to stage more pieces of this same genre was put on hold. On the premiere, the audience laughed at the innocent, childlike nature of the folk song staging, which had a strong emotional impact on Gual[126]. Consequently, the stage arrangements of other folk songs that Gual was working on, like La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida] and L'estudiant de Vic [The student from Vic], were shelved.

Conversely, L'alegria que passa, which had premiered at the same Teatre Íntim just two weeks earlier, did enjoy great success[127]. After a successful public premiere by Adrià Gual's company on January 16th, 1899, composer Enric Morera had then the idea of running a full season of Catalan lyric theater in one of the theaters of Barcelona. His goal was to promote the establishment of a national lyric genre that would compete, especially, with the predominance of Castilian zarzuela as the main lyric offer in Catalonia. The Tívoli theater hosted Morera's project, including L'alegria que passa as one of the main titles to be staged with a full commercial production. The name given by Morera to his enterprise was "Teatre Líric Català" [Catalan Lyric Theater], which remained the name for the whole Catalan lyric movement that started here, involving several artists and intellectuals until the 1920s.

Therefore, from the three initial lyric proposals that were developed between 1897 and 1899, the one that unanimously received the critic's and audience's approval was L'alegria que passa. Furthermore, it connected elements from the rural popular imagery, such as daily traditional life in the village, with modernized aesthetics, like decadent Symbolism. Local and international elements were intertwined, making it the referential standard of what Catalan intellectuals pretended to achieve. This great success positioned Enric Morera as the legitimate leader of the lyric movement to further promote the short-format operetta.

[127] The public success and long life of L'alegria que passa on Catalan stages will be further developed in chapter 3.

❖ Attempted institutionalization (1900–1904)

The great reception of L'alegria que passa in contrast to the rest of lyric proposals put forward in the aforementioned foundations of Catalan lyric theater made Enric Morera feel legitimized to take the lead of the movement and promote new initiatives to consolidate it. While Gual's theories were put on hold, Enric Morera developed his business project at the Tívoli theater without ever reaching any formal collaboration between the two. Consequently, a line would be drawn between these two sides, with different conceptions (and fortunes) of what Catalan lyric theater should be.

Morera would confirm his intentions to create a truly Catalan style of lyric theater in Catalan language with the founding of the Teatre Líric Català company, inaugurating its Catalan operetta season in 1901 with L'alegria que passa. Although it run for a short time, it's considered as a milestone in Catalan culture, as it was the first attempt to run a whole lyric theater season of exclusively Catalan works. Morera's company had about 20 actors, a 30-member mixed choir, and about 30 professional musicians, and scholars have pointed that it was precisely the large scale of the project what led to its financial failure[128].

As impresario, Morera maintained the collaboration with Rusiñol on the writing of two more lyrical works of a Symbolist bent, while also drawing on Naturalist followers such as Ignasi Iglésias (1871–1928). Both were criticized by the journal Joventut and by the Catalanist faction most devoted to Wagnerism and to fully sung opera. Symbolism was eventually shunned to the point that Rusiñol himself left his most representative lyrical work of the decadent style, El jardí abandonat [The abandoned garden], unperformed[129]. The Naturalist pieces were also not well received by this sector of the critics, since, under the principle of the "total work of art", the sung moments were neither plausible nor spontaneous in a Naturalist play[130].

The consequent business failure of Enric Morera has given rise to the claim that the flaws pointed by this artistic critique were the cause of his downfall, without going any further in the contextual study of his business proposal, his activist motivations, or the future performances of the repertoire commissioned by Morera as the cultural legacy of this project. The internal diversity of the repertoire, viewed from a unifying perspective, has led current historiography to understand it as a disjointed amalgam of different dramaturgical models that failed to be accepted by audiences and neither consolidated as a stable genre.

Given Morera's financial inability to sponsor the continuation of a stable project, the Catalan lyric theater movement began a new process of associative institutionalization and of attracting members and resources. The Foment del Teatre Líric Català association, founded in 1903, however, ended up appointing Adrià Gual at the start of the 1904/05 season as its director, restoring to him the artistic direction and intellectual leadership of the movement. The rivalry between the two lyrical proposals within the Catalanist movement became apparent when Adrià Gual publicly attacked Morera's recent season in his inaugural address at the Foment del Teatre Líric Català[131], using the same arguments as the critics in Joventut: improvisation, hastily written scores, poorly prepared sets, implausibility of the sung parts, lack of relation between the singing style and the content of the lyrics... However, it is worth pointing out that Gual had spent 1901 and 1902 in France, consequently missing out the performances of Morera's Teatre Líric Català. The fact that he assimilated Joventut's discourse denotes his personal surrender to the critics viewpoints, which had already harshly attacked his Symbolist experiments, leading him to give up on them.

Beyond artistic differences, there might have been some personal grievance between Gual and Morera. Initially, Morera had scheduled La núvia [The bride], written by Gual, during his 1901 lyric season, but the business problems that forced him to cut the season short led to the play's cancellation. It may be the case that Gual was personally disappointed with the Teatre Líric Català over the cancellation of the only play they commissioned and because they had not supported his vision of popular theater. Therefore, the change that occurs between 1904 and 1905 is not only institutional or solely economic in motive; rather, the renewal of the management and collaborating authors marks a change in the direction of the movement, which from that point on made Gual's theory of popular theater the structural axis of the new repertoire.

The following sections aim to provide more details about these early attempts at institutionalizing the movement led by Enric Morera and the project to consolidate Catalan operetta, up to the change in leadership of the movement that takes place in 1904 with Adrià Gual taking charge. The patronage of Lluís Graner (who simultaneously opened the Mercè hall with Gual as stage director, reformulating his theory under the new name "musical visions") redeemed the experimental Blancaflor by sponsoring the publication of the text, and Gual's lyrical projects would be revived on the Principal's stage under the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

- The first Teatre Líric Català season

Following the successful reception of L'alegria que passa when Adrià Gual premiered it with his Teatre Íntim company in 1899, Enric Morera felt motivated to promote a larger project and establish a full season of Catalan lyric theater. The following year, Morera's parents returned from Argentina, where they had migrated decades ago, and his father decided to support Enric with the necessary funds to rent the Tívoli theater for a few months and set up the so desired Catalan lyric theater season[132]. Along Morera as musical director of the season, a group of colleagues gathered around him to form the artistic management team. Ignasi Iglésias would join as literary director, and Miquel Utrillo would be vice-artistic director.

The project literally took the name of "Catalan lyric theater" as its own commercial name: Teatre Líric Català, indicating its strong nationalist motivation towards the settlement of a Catalan genre. The company operating at the theater would take the name of Catalan Operetta Company, and would include among its cast members multiple names that would continue in the Catalan lyric theater field up until Morera's last lyric business attempt in 1922, such as that of Assumpció Paricio. This soprano embodied the first Zaira in L'alegria que passa, which was officially premiered in a full-scale commercial production on January 8th, 1901. As well, Joaquim Viñas (1871–1946) also embodied the clown, a role he would continue performing throughout the following decades in the different productions of L'alegria que passa that he organized.

[132] IGLÉSIAS, Ignasi (1921): Enric Morera, estudi biogràfic, op. cit., p. 33.

Morera's goal was to promote a genre of Catalan operetta, following Castilian comic zarzuela's model in order to compete with it under the same conditions and attract the numerous audience it already had[133]. Therefore, he offered short pieces that alternated sung and spoken parts, and scheduled multiple short sessions throughout the day to lower the ticket prices and facilitate popular working classes to attend the shows. Nevertheless, this decision faced the straightforward opposition of multiple Catalanist factions that defended other models of lyric theater closer to long-format operatic genres, which led them to harshly criticize every single production premiered at the Teatre Líric Català season. Using their adept journals (like Joventut) to spread their voice, a large and intense press campaign against the Teatre Líric Català season was unleashed.

Showing no mercy, the press aggressively attacked the lyric productions with mean and pejorative words with the aim of sinking the project. Miquel Saperas's work on Enric Morera collects several of these reviews[134], which later have been used as the main source to scholarly evaluate the artistic value and reception of the project. However, he also highlights the support given by other authors and intellectuals that tried to denounce the campaign against Morera's vision of a Catalan operetta, which has been far less emphasized and is especially useful to understand the ideological motivations behind these attacks and the real situation its promoters were facing. For example, re-quoting Eduard Marquina's words:

> "[…] the Teatre Líric Català, which from its inception attracted large and enthusiastic audiences, which began its life with vigor and is ending it with determination and perseverance that are perfectly unique, found itself opposed from the outset by those who should have been its primary supporters and most enthusiastic maintainers.
> It costs very little, critics of La Veu and La Renaixença, my friends from Joventut, to analyze imperfections and not rectify them; to point out flaws and not take action to correct them; criticizing works without producing any; writing tirades without singing hymns; curling your lips like Aristarchus without plunging your hands into the furnace of the gods like Prometheus, in case we were the first victims of the fire and, for the sake of a foreseen and beloved ideal, we lost our honor, personality, reputation, life, and fortune.
> You have played a truly lamentable role, my dear friends, before the serene spectator. Never before has Mime's grotesque tirade criticizing the clumsiness, inexperience, and utter ignorance of the blacksmith Siegfried seemed so human and fair to me as it did on this occasion. And truly, you superficial Wagner idolaters do not entirely deserve the full weight of this satire.
> You have rejected as bad and bland all, absolutely all, the works premiered on the stage of the Teatre Líric, and instead of being ashamed of yourselves, defenders of a region that, at the first opportunity to open your mouths, said things so abominable in your opinion; instead of keeping quiet, driven away by such a terrible contradiction to your Catalanist dithyrambs; instead of at least having the courage of your convictions and honestly declaring what you insidiously implied —that the Castilian género chico is more perfect and has more right to exist than the same Catalan genre— you committed the most servile of vile acts with your readers and knowingly misled them. […][135]".

As Saperas indicates, in the following number of the same journal, Jaume Bansà, Joaquim Biosca, Alfons Maseras and Joan Puig i Ferreter published an statement joining Marquina's denounce. Others, like Lluís Via, stood up defending the opposing views that critics like Emili Tintorer had held in the aforementioned journals. Besides this particular conjuncture, the aggressive and destructive role of certain part of the Catalan press was an issue that artists related to the field of Catalan lyric theater dealt with throughout the following decades. Morera and Iglésias denounced the situation at the moment and held the same discourse in different publications and memoires up until the 1930s: no mercy was had on them by those who contributed the least to the lyric movement. Other artists such as Adrià Gual, which had been very affected by the attack to Blancaflor and it's mocking, also spoke out about the same issues in different moments of his career.

Therefore, Morera's and Iglésias's projected season of Teatre Líric Català was cut short and only lasted for about two months. Nevertheless, multiple considerations must be pointed out their contribution. Firstly, it was the first real attempt to establish a full season of Catalan lyric theater. Therefore, there was no tradition, no affiliated audience, no specialized venue nor professionalized company that were already operating. There was no running system or circuit they could cling to; they were rather acting to initiate one that could serve as a parallel alternative to the Spanish zarzuela system. As well, it was Morera's first time taking the role of impresario. Therefore, his management experience was limited, he had no repertoire already compiled to put on stage, nor stage sets backups for the theater productions: everything had to be commissioned as new.

The artistic team was mostly compromising with the project out of an activist will to contribute to Catalan culture. However, they faced the reality of the lyric field: it's a business. Professional authors would dedicate their efforts to write pieces that will pay off the most. They preferred to write for an already stablished and spread circuit like zarzuela in Spanish was, that would pay them their copyright for every performance, knowing that the pieces would circulate around a way larger area, rather than getting small amounts of money for a piece in Catalan that probably wouldn't enough a longer life on stage. As Santiago Folch said in Catalunya Artística in their defense:

> "The lack of restraint with which some Catalanist newspapers here have treated the nascent Teatre Líric Català has moved us today to make public statements that, were it not for this, might not have seen the light of day. […] Some, with a spirit not very just, have criticized works that have premiered at said theater, and, carried away by their rather heavy-handed intransigence, they have > spoken of it as if it were a finished product, when in fact it was merely a rehearsal, a nascent work, and thus we should have waited for it to take shape before judging it properly. […]

> Many complain that Morera has premiered many of his own works back to back; and we ask ourselves: what is the Master to do if those with whom he had more or less of a commitment delay sending him their works or simply stop writing them?[136]".

Morera and Iglésias faced this situation in 1901, but future lyric seasons would find the same issues in 1903, 1905, 1910 and 1922. The main issue that did not allow the settlement of a canonic lyric repertoire in Catalan was the lack of professional authors involved in writing new pieces to renew the repertoire. Impresarios interested in Catalan lyric theater were throughout the 1900s and 1910s still reprising some of the initial pieces commissioned by Morera in 1901.

Cases of study like L'alegria que passa prove that, even if this institutional attempt did not live for long, it provided Catalan companies with an initial lyric repertoire that enjoyed a way longer life out of official lyric seasons due to the audience's interest. Other titles from this season, like La reina del cor [The queen of the heart] or La Rosons also remained alive, especially in amateur theater or reprised in future lyric seasons. Therefore, even if Morera was not able to maintain throughout time and fully institutionalize a company of Catalan lyric theater, his attempt was partially successful in providing the Catalan lyric theater movement with its first foundations and an initial repertoire written under his commission and sponsorship.

Nevertheless, despite their good will and intentions, and keeping in mind the multiple issues they were faced with, the mismanagement of some aspects of the productions has to be recognized. The lack of preparation and the impulsive start of the project led them to struggle to keep up with the pace that theater production required. With no collection of pieces already waiting to be premiered throughout the season, they were forced to take whatever piece arrived to them, not being able to select from the best titles, even in many occasions having Morera to save the productions in the last minute with his own composition. As stated by Morera, sometimes they had to take the scores from his hands with the ink still wet due to the rush to rehearse them[137]. All stage sets had to be new and the troupe of actors and actresses was unequally trained. Therefore, from their very initial successes, like L'alegria que passa or La reina del cor, the level of the productions quickly declined[138].

Despite these conditions, the impresarios managed to premiere 13 new productions in the two months that their season run. They did not promote a single vision of how the repertoire should be like but collaborated with authors from different trends. Morera continued working with Santiago Rusiñol, producing a proper commercial premiere of L'alegria que passa, and commissioning two new lyric dramas that continued the decadent Symbolist style of their previous collaboration: Cigales i formigues [Cicadas and ants] and El jardí abandonat [The abandoned garden][139]. On the meantime, Ignasi Iglésias also provided the company with his own librettos to be premiered during the lyric season, such as La reina del cor or Les caramelles [The folk pan flutes], approaching lyric theater from the Naturalist trend. Nevertheless, the idea of a Catalan operetta that presented on scene Catalan traditions, customs and peoples as they were in real life received critiques for "being too close to the natural", lacking an artistic approach, not being Modernist enough, and also, from a moralistic perspective, being too close to Castilian zarzuela and not being cultivated and literate enough for Catalan peoples[140].

From the pieces premiered during the season, it would probably be worth remarking La reina del cor for the multiple subsequent performances and reprises that it received (along the case of L'alegria que passa), including for instance a second premiere in 1903 at the Romea theater. The action takes place on Saint Anthony's day, when the Tres Toms Catalan tradition takes place. The main character of the piece is "the queen" of the hostel that Paula rules. While both women are alone, they talk about the queen's relations with men, since she should soon find a husband.

When Tralla stops by, he declares to Paula that he's in love with the queen. As Paula intercedes with her to consider liking him and Tralla meets the queen for further conversations, the audience will learn that they were in love with each other when they were young, but she pretended to despise him, which led him to find another wife that died while giving birth. In between these conversations, the queen sings a few musical solos as verisimilar moments in the story that Paula hears, as well as a love duo between Paula and Tralla.

Eventually Tralla proposes her to love each other and take his daughter as her own, showing the queen the doll he carries for her daughter as a symbolic proposal to embrace her. After she agrees, the rest of men from that were celebrating Saint Anthony's day arrive to drink at the hostel playing festive music. Milhomes complains with the rest of men about the priest that was blessing the animals and pets, as the tradition for that day calls for. They end up knowing about Tralla's proposed marriage to the queen. Paula's son shows his deception because he loved her too, but it is now too late for him. They end up celebrating at the hostel with music and dance while Tralla goes to the townhall to get the marriage paperwork.

Therefore, La reina del cor presents in one act a continuous action, based on conversations between the characters that throughout the piece unveil their past relationships and how these shape their present personal tensions and desires, following a Naturalist dramaturgy. The piece shows Catalan popular characters, aims to present to the public the Catalan customs of Saint Anthony's day, as they also speak of local food and beverages at the hostel, and overall depicts Catalan popular classes, their festivities and their festive music.

Other remarkable titles premiered during the season were Cors joves [Young hearts] and La nit de Nadal [Christmas Eve], both written by Josep M.ª Jordà (1870–1936), with music by Joan Gay (1868–1926) the first and Enric Morera the latter; La Rosons and Picarol by Apel·les Mestres (1854–1936), with music by Enric Morera and Enric Granados[141]; and L'adoració dels pastors [The adoration of the shepherds], with text by Jacint Verdaguer and music by Morera.

Besides these, they also announced plenty of collaborations at the beginning of the season that were never premiered, although some of them were already written when the season was suddenly cut short. For instance, the reprise of L'aplec del remei (the first zarzuela written in Catalan) by Josep Anselm Clavé (1824–1874) was in Morera's mind at the beginning of the season; Iglésias was also planning to write El cant de les mares [Mothers' chanting] for Morera to add his music.

The composer had already the music for several pieces, such as Vila blanca [White vila] written by J. Llopart, El firaire [The carny] by J. Orpinell, L'arc de Sant Martí [The rainbow] by T. Monegal and L'esparver [The sparrow hawk] by C. Capdevila. Although the scores for these titles can be found in Morera's personal archive, they were never premiered in public.

Collaboration with other composers, such as Pere E. Ferran (1865–1919), Amadeu Vives (1871–1932), Joan Borràs de Palau (1868–1953) and Carles Oró (d. 1909) was also planned, although they eventually did not premiere any music during the lyric season[142].

[141] For a further insight on Apel·les Mestres's contribution to the Catalan lyric repertoire, see: ARMANGUÉ I HERRERO, Joan (2015): "Apel·les Mestres i el Teatre Líric Català: Documents del Fons Carles Pellicer (1900–1913) al Museu Abelló de Mollet del Vallès", *4a. [142] The program with the planned titles for the upcoming season was published in December 1900. [CDMAE: record 424524].

Although initially Francisco de Pérez-Cabrero (1854–1914) was announced as musical conductor, the following programs announcing the titles scheduled for each day announced that Celestí Sadurní (1863–1910) would be in charge of conducting the orchestra. As well, Miquel Romanyà is mentioned as choir conductor, and Morera's choir Catalunya Nova was planned to join the stage in the pieces that required so. Among the cast of actors, it's worth noting Assumpció Paricio and Joaquim Viñas for the career they would develop from here on in the lyric theater field. As well, Carme Bertran, Assumpció Costa, Elisa Castillo, Lorenzo Parés, Secundi Gil, Claudi Rigol, Miquel Sirvent, and Ramon Bataller are often mentioned taking relevant roles in the productions.

After running for the months of January and February, the impresarios ran out of budget. Their productions incurred in high expenses that they were not able to cover and debts kept summing up. Since Morera's family was not particularly wealthy to overcome the production expenses, they decided to finish the project before it affected their personal stability, and the Teatre Líric Català was halted[143].

[143] IGLÉSIAS, Ignasi (1921): Enric Morera, estudi biogràfic, op. cit., p. 34.

- Foment del Teatre Líric Català association

After Morera's unsuccessful attempts to sustain in time his Teatre Líric Català season, new efforts were made by Catalanist popular supporters to promote the continuation of the project. Morera's initiative was channeling a common desire among cultural intellectuals and artists, who gathered in June 1903 to discuss this issue at the restaurant Els quatre gats [Four cats], a well-known meeting point for Modernists. On June 16th, "the first preparatory meeting took place, heading towards the implantation of the so desired Catalan Lyric Theater, and the project to create an association that will pursue that end was made public[144]".

The first meetings were dedicated to discussing how to approach the different activities that should be carried out by the association following the best practical sense. Also, different people from outside Barcelona also requested to join the preparatory committee, both individual members and already-established entities, proof of the enthusiasm that the project was arising. Therefore, it is confirmed that, from the very beginning, the Catalan lyric theater movement had a regional reach, going further than just the professional theaters in the capital city. As well, the discussions to design its application also proof the premeditation of the project, how the new genres of national culture were consciously designed, and the plurality of criteria of the interested members.

However, the first press reviews that announced the call and that prompted for people to attend the meetings remark "the idea of creating an association to establish and spread Catalan zarzuela[145]" to "give a good and firm blow with the broom to that thing called género chico [Castilian comic zarzuela in one act][146]". Therefore, it indicates that the project aimed to continue Morera's proposal of a Catalan genre that formally imitated Spanish zarzuela to promote an internal substitution. The discussions inside the committee would have approached practical issues rather than a debate on how the genre should be, which would take place later between the different editorial views of the Catalan press.

Journals such as Joventut or Catalunya, which longed for a Catalan opera inspired by Wagner's influence, although not openly against the new lyric project, already warned them not to follow Morera's example and to learn from his mistakes, stating that his repertoire had not been Catalan enough[147]. Others like La Publicidad, openly anti-Catalan, announced the reorganization of Catalan Lyric Theater as the return of "our domestic wolves, without claws but with drool", causing that "some of us will rip off our skin and some other will use the ripped stripes to cover us[148]". Before it was born, the project was already facing harsh opposition.

The statutes were publicly read at Els quatre gats on June 25th, 1903. The following meeting was held on July 20th to discuss and vote the approval of the statutes, this time gathering at the premises of Catalunya Federal at 93, Hospital street. Soon after, by the beginning of the following theatrical season, the association was already organizing a new Catalan Lyric Theater season at the Principal theater of Barcelona. The conductor would be Celestí Sadurní, the same as in Morera's 1901 first season, and the project would start with the reprise of the titles premiered in 1901, such as La reina del cor, La Rosons and L'alegria que passa, including a new one written by Apel·les Mestres and Enric Morera titled La barca [The rowboat]. The inauguration took place on September 19th and the baritone Lorenzo Parés was the leader of the newly established company. However, the project only lasted for a few weeks and by the beginning of October they had already left the Principal theater[149].

In some of the scores that they used for this short season, the following stamp can be seen on the paper. The Teatre Líric Català logo featured a stave with a treble clef representing music. The clef is merged with a square shield crossed by four bars from the historical Catalan flag. Behind the shield, a rising sun appears, probably as a symbolic reference to the national awakening or the rise of national culture. Vegetal motifs are placed on the sides.

The association eventually took the name of Foment del Teatre Líric Català [Promotion of Catalan Lyric Theater] and on October 10th the installment of its official office at 7, Baix de Sant Pere street was announced. Little is known about the members that formed the association, only that they were mostly young and active enthusiasts. In April 1904 the names of the high positions of the association appear as signatories of a public statement published in the press: Cristòfol Rabella was the president, and Fermí Casanovas and Bartomeu Oliver were the secretaries. As well, Mr. Benavente is mentioned in other reviews as the public representant of the association at some cultural events. In February 1904, an extraordinary general council was celebrated, and the address of the association had changed to 7, Lladó street.

Among the activities that they planned to organize throughout the season there were:

- singing and declamation lessons to train "genuinely Catalan artists",
- the creation of an authors' society to agglutinate literary and musical authors from Catalonia in order to promote the creation of new pieces,
- the celebration of public competitions to award the best newly written plays that directly met the purpose of the association, aiming to stimulate creation in Catalan.

From these plans, the only one that is confirmed that took place was the singing and declamation lessons. By the end of the season, on June 16th, the association organized a public demonstration with its students to show the results of their training. The program was made of short dramatic pieces like La barca by Apel·les Mestres and La por [Fear] by Modest Urgell (1839–1919). Catalan and foreign music was sung, and poetry was also read. A duo from the unpublished piece La gerra de les unces [The jar of ounces] was also played[150]. Among the actors and singers that participated and therefore were students of the association were Mr. Rabella, Olivar, Arniges, Barrau, Olivé, Nicolau, Capdevila, Puig, Romeva, Role and Polls. At least 11 were announced[151].

At the start of the following season in October, Adrià Gual entered the team of Foment del Teatre Líric Català as a teacher and artistic director of the association. Along with him, E. Dachs and Lluís Blach gave lessons in singing, M. Dachs and J. Cumellas in musical language and sight-reading, and Enric Giménez (1868–1939) in declamation[152]. In his official presentation as the new artistic director, Gual read a discourse on the state of Catalan lyric theater, which is one of the very few theoretical sources on this topic. In it, he presented his historical conception of the repertoire, and the national and international roots of the movement. Regarding its relation with foreign repertoires, he rejected Mediterranean influences, aspiring to connect with the Germanic tradition of a dramatic musical theater, following Wagner's precedent while repulsing Italian primacy of easy melodic elements and weak plots[153].

In May 1904, before finishing their first active season, the association published a call for assistance, promoting their artistic goal to consolidate a Catalan lyric theater that would oppose Castilian zarzuela:

> "This entity, born in equal measure to the other artistic societies flourishing in Catalonia since the rebirth of the spirit of the land, extends to you its friendly voice, asking for your help in its task of purifying, without respite, the atmosphere that is corrupting certain segments of our public.
> Everyone's conscience is disgusted at the shameless, almost pornographic displays, the dirty jokes, and the crude construction typical of much of the so-called "género chico" works that a large and mythicized blow of wind from the West has brought to the stage.
> And there is a lack of hygiene in the matter, since such spectacles, which only entertain the scum, cannot be endured by the seriousness and decency of any honest family.
> Therefore, in this manifesto, as we seek your support, we emphasize the general principle that Art is an element of culture for peoples, and that for mankind to enjoy beauty, it is necessary to be educated in it. […][154]"

They finished their letter asking for artist to contribute with their creativity and people to help them paying subscriptions, "and then, we will all have helped, not only the Motherland, but also to carry out a moralizing campaign".

In September, by the beginning of the following season, the press announced that "an important Catalanist society in Barcelona aims to promote Catalan lyric works, premiering those by new writers and composers while avoiding any dealings with certain lyric societies where fees and more fees are often paid without the members' wishes ever being met[155]." A clear allusion to the Foment del Teatre Líric Català and their inability to produce quick results on the stage, focused so far on the training of actors. There was a clear purpose to create a parallel alternative to this existing association.

A relevant personality from the Catalan artistic field felt appealed by their call. However, instead of becoming the sponsor the association wished for, he became a parallel promoter that eventually colonized the existing lyric institutions and took control of the direction of the Catalan lyric theater movement, gathering all the lyric activity in his own newly created project. This person would be the renowned painter Lluís Graner, who counted with a wealthy enough patrimony to become the main patron of the movement.

❖ Business consolidation (1904–1909)[156]

In November 1904, the Sala Mercè or Mercè hall led by Lluís Graner opened at the Rambla dels Estudis, in the core historical center of the city of Barcelona, with the goal of producing highly artistic lyric productions. Inspired by Gual's theories, Graner revived his conception of a "popular theater" based on "Catalan folk songs arranged for the stage", presented now under vitalist Symbolist aesthetics and stage sets that included the latest technological and artistic experimentation with colored electric lighting, shadows and projections, and other special effects.

Earlier that year, Gual had signed the prologue for the edition of Blancaflor, published in April in the journal Catalunya, run by Josep Carner (1884–1970). The poet, most likely encouraged by Graner, brought to the public the unedited text of the first "Catalan folk song harmonized for the stage" written by Gual as a symbolic way of redeeming its failed premiere before reviving the genre at the soon-to-be-inaugurated Mercè hall. The same Adrià Gual would be hired as stage director and counsellor of Graner's project.

After a first successful season, Graner rented the Principal theater of Barcelona to provide a larger stage for his lyric productions, where Gual's still not premiered lyric plays were staged, as well as many others by Enric Morera, who also became a permanent collaborator. Therefore, Graner had gathered by his side two of the main promoters of Catalan lyric theater, which had led the major theoretical and practical contributions to the movement so far.

As for Enric Morera, he found in Graner the sponsor he needed to stabilize his production as a composer, which allowed him to retire to Sitges for a few years while sending his scores over to be played in Barcelona[157]. Most of Graner's lyric productions were new titles and Morera became one of his main allies, willing to write music for many of them and saving him in moments of urgent need when other composers dropped the commissions at the last minute[158]. As well, Morera granted him the rights to reprise the pieces from his first 1901 Teatre Líric Català season, which were staged in between Graner's original productions while the new sets were being made.

This way, Graner had quickly gained control over most of the Catalan lyric movement. He became the producer of new titles, was in charge of reprising the existing old ones, and was indirectly in control of external organizations like Foment del Teatre Líric Català, whose activity he eventually absorbed. Besides the classes now led by Gual the Foment association continued providing during the 1904/05 season, no further activity is known. The initiative was deactivated by Graner's total control. He had its artistic director under his wing and had left them with no repertoire to perform.

As the new leader of the Catalan lyric theater movement, he prompted a change in its artistic line. The genre of operetta and Catalan zarzuela previously promoted by the Teatre Líric Català project were relegated in favor of the new Symbolist genre called "musical visions", which became the star productions that characterized Graner's brand.

This new format aimed to stage traditional folk songs, legends and tales in a modern style to appeal to the urban audience of the newly inaugurated 20th century. Directly influenced by the Symbolism of Maeterlinckian art theater, the musical visions presented a brief format with a dramaturgy that moved beyond literary theater, integrating visual and sound elements in order to transcend dramatic action in favor of emotional and sensorial suggestion. Through the spectacular nature of the stage productions (featuring a wide variety of painted curtains, lighting effects, special scenic tricks, musical choirs and dances), musical visions were aimed to create suggestive atmospheres or moods that would arouse emotions in the audience through the senses.

However, the ultimate objective was to continue the generational transfer of popular oral folklore in the urban space, where it was now staged. If harmonized folk songs had been widely accepted in the choral repertoire by different layers of society, from workers' to elite choirs, bringing them now to the stage as a theatrical production was a logical step towards the creation of a national mass cultural product.

This process of staging was based on a series of intertextual and intermodal connections through which the producers intended to "visualize" orally transmitted folklore, hence the term "musical vision". This way, urban society and especially children could continue consuming traditional folklore in a modern form able to compete with other contemporary productions, ensuring the continuity and transmission of traditional culture.

The particular characteristics of musical visions made people perceive them as a genre of lyric theater that differed from others. While other nomenclatures like "lyric drama" or "operetta" were often diluted into the term "zarzuela" by the Catalan press and public opinion, "musical visions" were quite distinctive and eventually became the label used to refer to Symbolist theater in general. They probably were the model that most approached the movement's goal of creating a distinctive and genuinely Catalan genre of lyric theater.

It should also be noted that the consolidation of the genre of musical visions was a project of activist and pedagogical nature. Rather than seeking business profit, its promoters sought to disseminate their nationalist ideas and to instruct the audience in their own ethical and moral values. For this reason, the content of the pieces was carefully selected and presented in a manner that maintained the ideological line established by the companies and their directors. Under this strict supervision and censorship, they secured their main objective of nationalizing the working classes by disseminating rural folklore in the urban environment, promoting the Catalan language, and popularizing the imagination and mythology associated with Catalanism. Furthermore, they were instructing the audiences in the correct aesthetic taste and Catholic moral values.

It is worth highlighting the genre of musical visions as the proposal of traditionalist and Catholic Catalanism to establish a national genre of lyric theater, a concern that arose during late Modernism as part of the Catalanist cultural project to embrace the totality of the arts from a national and moral perspective. To this end, artists and intellectuals involved in Catalanism came up with various formal and stylistic proposals to meet the needs that the national lyric genre should cover according to their personal ideological perspective. It should therefore be noted that traditionalist and Catholic ideologies would notably influence the iconography and symbolism of these pieces, conceived as materializations of those ideological positionings within the nationalist spectrum.

Among the main promoters of this lyric genre, we can highlight the names of Lluís Graner, Adrià Gual, and still very young Josep Carner as the primary core in Barcelona, as well as other regular collaborators such as Enric Morera, Joan Lambert, Adrià Esquerrà, etc. Between 1904 and 1910, backed up mainly by Rafael Masó, Joaquim Vancells and Joan Llongueras, they promoted and spread the genre of musical visions throughout Catalan territory under Graner's leadership. This ranged from the initial Sala Mercè in Barcelona[159] to Ars-Lucis in Terrassa[160], the Saló Gerió in Girona, as well as other venues and company itinerancies in Tarragona, Reus, Manresa or Olot, which eventually built a whole regional network. Of particular note were the Espectacles-Audicions Graner held at the Principal theater in Barcelona[161], which were the culmination of the project and the only initiative within the Catalan lyric theater movement that achieved relative continuity producing multiple consecutive seasons in a large-scale theater.

- The Mercè hall and the network of musical visions venues

The new genre of "musical visions" premiered at the Mercè hall, which was inaugurated in 1904 by Lluís Graner at Rambla dels Estudis in Barcelona. The painter, emulating the model of entertainment venues with cinema, variety shows, and art installations, established the Mercè hall as an experimental project. He engaged in experimentation with the production of both fiction and documentary films, combining staged scenes with voiceovers. He directed theatrical performances incorporating electric lights of various colors and intensities with music and poetry (known as "musical visions") with dramaturgies based on sensorial suggestion.

The basement floor, designed by Gaudí to emulate a grotto, also contained art installations[162]. The monumental nativity scenes were particularly striking, becoming an annual tradition at the hall that worked as a visual attraction with the intention of repopularizing this Christmas tradition. Another main attraction from the Mercè hall was the "spoken films". During its first season, the hall produced its own short comic films and, during screenings, the actors spoke their lines aloud while hidden behind the curtain or on the orchestral pit[163]. Graner obtained a patent for these shows as the city's first sound screenings through this particular technique.

His aim was to offer these popular formats, with short sessions and affordable ticket prices, from an artistic and moral perspective, standpoint, thereby enhancing their intellectual content. The intention was to consolidate the space as a cultural center accessible to both the working-class and bourgeois families that presented shows in line with Catholic morality and attractive to children, but at the same time visually and aesthetically appealing.

Throughout the three and a half seasons that the scenic project lasted at the Mercè hall, the style and content of the repertoire of musical visions shifted and evolved, although it maintained the same form and imagery based on short plays that depicted medievalistic and fantastic settings, aimed at materially visualizing oral folklore and tales from the Catalan tradition. The initial goal of these stage productions was the plastic and visual experimentation under the artistic direction of Lluís Graner. The projection of shadows creating silhouettes, the use of electric lights mixing their colors and changing intensities, even combinations of filmed scenes with live performance on stage, were all new and extremely modern elements to experiment with on stage.

Such were the cases of the vision of Montserrat, in which he recreated the iconic outline of Montserrat mountain while children sang chants in honor of the Virgin the hermitage in Montserrat is dedicated to, with a final fantastic appearance of a little girl playing Virgin Mary between beams of white light. As well, Dante a les portes de l'infern [Dante at the gates of hell]) presented poet Dante at the gates depicted by himself in his Inferno while Boito's Mefistofele instrumental opening is being played. Adrià Gual's watercolors for the stage design are still preserved, showing the combination of colors between the painted backdrops and the colored spotlights projected on them. Some of the presented works also recreated natural effects on stage, such as the storm that takes place in the vision of L'Atlàntida [Atlantis], inspired on the prologue of Jacint Verdaguer's homonymous poem.

The following season focused on the poetic suggestion and nationalist Symbolism materializing on stage folk songs and legends from Catalan folklore. The season opened on September 13th, 1905, with the premiere of La mort de l'escolà [The death of the altar boy], a musical vision based on Antoni Nicolau's well-known song set to Verdaguer's poem. The hall's next production, La dona d'aigua [Aloja or Undine], also consisted of the staging of a preexisting poem, in this case by Miquel Costa i Llobera, about a character from Catalan mythology. Other visions were directly based on the original retrieved folk legends and songs, as is the case with A la voreta del mar [By the sea], a popular song arranged here by Adrià Esquerrà (1873–1927), and La pastoreta [The little shepherd], with music arranged by Narcisa Freixas (1859–1926). Also noteworthy is the case of La cova de les serps [The serpent's cave], a musical vision based on a Germanic legend, which underscores the internationalist conception of the use of folk legend that Adrià Gual, the stage director, explains in his theoretical writings.

Following productions during the 1906/07 season were rather based on moral teaching through children's popular tales and eventually some comic pieces, still including incidental or casual singing of folk songs and the characteristic medievalistic imagery. The titles based on foreign fairy tales stand out especially, such as La caperutxa roja [Little red riding hood] (by Charles Perrault and retold by the Brothers Grimm) or Somni d'una nit d'hivern [A winter night's dream] (an adaptation of Hans Christian Andersen's The little match girl). Nevertheless, there will still be some new titles based on the direct staging of Catalan folk songs, such as El mal ric [The bad rich man] or La gentil porquerola [The kind little swineherd]. The line of productions based on biblical episodes or religious figures is also continued, with titles such as Somni de Jacob [Jacob's dream], Jesús és nat [Jesus is born], or Moisès [Moses].

Despite the company's willingness to continue its operations, new municipal measures aimed at movie theaters began to be announced in September 1907. Previously, the city council had already required architectural reforms and remodeling of performance halls to ensure emergency exits and prevent overcrowding due to regular fires in these venues. In this case, a ban on stage performances in movie theaters was being requested. It included "all those that require decorations, scenery, [and] lighting effects[164]", that is, the main elements of musical performances. Additionally, musicians' pits were prohibited in movie theaters.

In November, stage performances were officially banned in several movie halls, including the Mercè hall. The last production announced before the ban, Se n'ha de venir de mena [You must have been born that way], never made it to premiere. Nevertheless, the hall remained open. The main floor continued its film programming and increased advertising in newspapers and announcements of newly released titles, many of which were exclusive or commissioned for the theater. Highlights included current events films, documentaries, sports films, and comedic fiction. However, the main attraction was the basement grottoes, where Lluís Graner was able to continue designing artistic installations.

On the other hand, the actors performing at the Mercè hall did have to leave the venue. For the rest of the season, they toured other Catalan cities and towns, bringing the Mercè hall's musical visions —which served as a publicity draw— to those places. The Mercè hall's activities under Lluís Graner's direction lasted until 1910, when the painter announced its closure.

The team that formed around the Mercè hall included Lluís Graner as owner, sponsor, and artistic director; Josep Carner as lyricist and playwright; Adrià Gual as stage director and theater programmer; Joan Baptista Lambert (1884–1945) as pianist and musical director; and Antoni Ros i Güell (1877–1954) as plastic artist and set designer[165]. The success of the venue was such that the intellectual circle closest to his team expanded the initiative by creating a network of similar halls across Catalonia. With the Mercè hall serving as the creative hub from which the proposals radiated, other venues were set up in Girona, Terrassa, and Sabadell with Graner's support.

Rafael Masó (1880–1935), a close friend of Josep Carner, became acquainted with the initiative taking place in Barcelona while studying in the Catalan capital. Upon returning to his native Girona, he established the Gerió hall there with the support of the Centre Moral Gironí and his brother Narcís Masó (1890–1953). The new venue opened its doors in April 1906. The musical vision of L'oració de la nit [The night prayer], premiered there, enjoyed a long run as a piece in the children's repertoire including gestural choreography during its performance based on the Dalcroze pedagogy.

Shortly thereafter, in October 1906, the painter Joaquim Vancells (1866–1942), a member of the same artistic and Catholic circles as Graner, inaugurated the Ars-Lucis gallery in Terrassa. He enjoyed the close support of Joan Llongueras (1880–1953), who was also a close friend of the Masó brothers from Girona. Llongueras, who had also established professional relations with Lluís Graner, was a collaborator of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. In addition to personal friendship and cultural influence, stage collaborations were established between this circuit of venues, which came to share part of their repertoire. For instance, the Ars-Lucis hall hosted musical visions previously premiered at the Mercè and the Gerió halls, as well as newly written titles.

At the start of the following season, in October 1907, an attempt was made to establish another venue in the neighboring city of Sabadell. The "Saló Artístic" or Artistic hall was inaugurated in the building of the Catholic Association of Sabadell. The commencement of its activities was facilitated by the direct support of Lluís Graner, who provided not only the texts and scores of three of his musical visions from the Mercè hall, but also the scenery and costumes. The Artístic hall produced two more musical visions prior to the conclusion of the season, written by anonymous local authors from Sabadell.

Beyond the network directly linked to the Mercè hall, the place of origin of musical visions, the genre was found appealing by many other venues and cultural centers throughout Catalonia. Multiple halls, dramatic troupes, and Catholic and moral centers that offered, at some point of their lifespan, brief seasons of musical visions.

Besides the capital city, other municipalities such as Manresa, Olot, Arenys de Mar, and Tarragona featured multiple halls where this symbolist theatrical genre was performed. The following listing of venues is arranged in chronological order according to the inauguration of the seasons of musical visions, with the exception of the Euterpe hall, which corresponds to a direct continuation of the Montserrat hall and, consequently, is positioned subsequent to it.

The span of venues dedicated to musical visions covers most of the cultural scene of Catalonia, geographically and socially. The diversity of documented spaces indicates the wide adoption of the genre, not only by recreational venues led by painters and other plastic artists such as Graner, Vancells or Masó, but also by amateur dramatic troupes, Catholic and moral centers, and commercial theaters. Even some of them were personal initiatives, such as the Domènech family theater in their private tower in Olot.

It is noteworthy that the majority of the halls that hosted musical visions did not program them as sporadic premieres over time, but rather as brief seasons that were meticulously programmed from the artistic direction. Along with the programming of the pieces, a sociopolitical program is also implicit, since the genre has been closely linked since its origins to the promotion of Catholic morality and traditional values. Therefore, it was not only an aesthetic decision, but a sociopolitical positioning.

In certain instances, such as the Montserrat hall in Manresa or the Montserrat hall in Arenys de Mar, it is evident that the endeavor to implement the genre proved unsuccessful. This outcome can be attributed to the public's predilection for the comic theatrical genre, which made artistic directors shift back to the programming of comedies. Other notable cases include the theater of the Patronat de l'Obrer de Tarragona and the Catholic Centre of Olot, which were personal projects aimed at infusing the genre into existing dramatic groups. These projects concluded upon the cessation of the respective directors' involvement.

Although none of them had a particularly long life, the identification of this network is of vital relevance to realize the geographical span of the genre and to understand how it was publicly perceived and commercially distributed. Musical visions —and the movement of Catalan lyric theater altogether— were not only a urban phenomenon given in the capital city, but a regional movement. The spreading of the genre is also proof of the public impact and media repercussion that the Mercè hall had in the Catalan cultural life, further that just in Barcelona. Most of the venues documented here were directly inspired by Graner's project, even sometimes reporting on the press the importation of this genre from Barcelona as an appeal.

The forced closure of the Mercè hall by government order undoubtedly had an impact on the continuity of the rest of venues in the network, which soon after ended up ceasing their activities. However, a final attempt was made to maintain the musical vision genre present in Barcelona following the transfer of the Mercè hall to new proprietors in 1910 and the permanent exile of Lluís Graner from Catalonia.

In September 1911, Baldomer Marinel·lo (1884–1953), who had been the leading actor at the Mercè hall company (and had also directed its tour at the Reus Reading Center in 1908), installed his company at the Imperi hall to offer a season of musical visions. He received notable support from his brother, Manuel Marinel·lo (1870–1940), who collaborated as a librettist, and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe (1877–1954), who did so as a composer. Both had previous experience in the genre, as they had writen various musical visions for Graner's companies. Other collaborators who wrote musical visions for the Imperi hall also came from between the former collaborators of the Mercè hall, such as Joan B. Lambert, Adrià Esquerrà, or Rafael Nogueras Oller (1880–1949). However, the company only operated the venue from September 1911 to January 1912, later moving to the Catalanist Centre Gent Nova, but abandoning the musical visions project.

Similarly, Antoni Ros i Güell persisted in his involvement with the plastic installations that had become popular at the grottos of the Mercè hall, even opting to relocate the project when the original Mercè hall was closed down permanently by court order. As well, the film activity at the hall was continued by the Hispano Films company, where Adrià Gual worked as a film director, supposing his comeback to the Mercè hall after his first period there as a stage director for the inaugural season.

However, the scattering of the activities without the sole leadership of Lluís Graner, in addition to the restrictions imposed by the local administration, meant that the original project of the Mercè hall as a multidisciplinary recreational venue was irretrievable. In a similar manner, its regional network of theater and movie halls collapsed when it lost the Mercè hall's central support, which included the exclusive distribution of imported art films and the itineracy of new stage productions.

- The Espectacles-Audicions Graner

After a first successful season was arranged at the Mercè hall by debuting Lluís Graner, newly reconverted to theater impresario, the former painter decided to embark on a greater theatrical journey. The stage experimentation he had developed at the small-scale stage of the Mercè hall, which was actually registered as a cinematographic hall, required now a larger stage. The long lines that formed at the entrance of the Mercè hall led Graner to consider that he needed to take his lyric productions to a larger scale. The nearby Principal theater, located at the same avenue where the Mercè hall was, had been the main theater of the city of Barcelona, which still held a symbolic place in the capital's cultural imagery, but was at the present moment in a decadent state, in regards of its architectonic structure and the quality of the productions that were programmed.

When the bet for the lease of the theater was announced, Graner had no doubt about his intentions, eventually achieving his purpose. He installed there his "Espectacles-Audicions Graner" and transferred the best staff under his service: Adrià Gual as stage director, Josep Carner as literary arranger and Joan B. Lambert as musical conductor, who were already working for him at the Mercè hall. However, the large-scale production expenses of a venue like this exceeded Graner's management skills, who would not able to produce benefits to maintain the project in the long term.

Although Graner's initial plan was to mainly stage musical visions, that changed with time. The initial artistic team surrounding Graner marked a clear difference with its predecessor, which reinforces the idea of a segmented movement. As impresario, Lluís Graner would typically commission authors directly. If at the Teatre Líric Català the writers Santiago Rusiñol (critic of the Catholic Church) and Ignasi Iglésias (leftist republican) stood out, at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner Catholic writers Adrià Gual and Josep Carner would be the main contributors, being the latter hired on a fixed salary to arrange legends and song lyrics according to Graner's instructions[166]. His company not only represents a change in creative principles compared to the company directed by Morera, but the marked difference in the selection of authors and collaborators, with very few overlaps, reinforces the contrast between the two business proposals and their ideological followers.

From these very few exceptions, we can note that Apel·les Mestres collaborated by writing librettos for both companies, ranging from Pre-Raphaelite idealism to Nordic folklore fantasy[167]. Anticlerical composer Enric Morera would also contribute to both projects, being one of the few figures who could set aside his personal political ideology to work alongside Graner, reaching a personal friendship based on a shared love for their motherland and a common artistic ideal centered on the staging of Catalan folklore.

Nevertheless, it is important to bear in mind the events reported in the office of the newspaper Cu-cut![168] and the consequent birth of Solidaridad Catalana as a political coalition of different Catalanist parties. In the cultural field, a clear parallel to this political coalition can be seen in the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, which also attempted to bring together the different theatrical proposals of Catalan lyric theater within its programming, thus establishing the Principal theater as a space for the meeting and unification of cultural Catalanism. Eventually, the influence of collaborators like Àngel Guimerà made him open up his program to lyric dramas, as well as the support of playwrights like Josep Morató (1875–1918) or Eduard Aulés (1839–1913) made him include several musical comedies, which led him to announce a whole line of programming dedicated to operetta.

Although the artistic direction of the theater was in the hands of Lluís Graner, who was the main economic sponsor of the enterprise and impresario in charge of the company operating the theater, he relied in the help and assistance of other artists. Graner eventually built a network around the theater that gathered most of the personalities of Catalan culture, in an effort of institutionalizing, centralizing and unifying Catalan culture under the same roof. Besides the aforementioned core of artists in the directing team of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the impresario managed to create a wide network of collaborators, to which each of his close team provided his own contacts.

For instance, Enric Morera approached him to renowned playwright Àngel Guimerà, and probably as well as to the troupe of Catalan lyric actors that had worked for him in the 1901 season he arranged, which came to form the Principal theater's new company. As well, Josep Carner approached Rafael Masó to the project when he was still an architecture student, who later imported the musical visions to Girona. At the same time, Masó held a friendship with Joan Llongueras, who ended up writing multiple musical visions for the dedicated hall opened in Terrassa.

As for Adrià Gual, he was a colleague of Enric Granados, who had written the music for his Blancaflor, and who would also write Gaziel to be premiered at the Principal theater. As well, Gual approached young Jaume Pahissa (1880–1969) to the project, who wrote his first stage music for the stage ruled by Graner. Composer Felip Pedrell, even if openly despising Graner's project due to his strong disagreement with the genre of lyric theater that should become the national genre[169], ended up collaborating with him as a personal favor to his trusted friend Adrià Gual. Convinced that musical visions were inferior to his previous operatic works, he ended up writing La matinada [The sunrise] for the first season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, although it's uneven reception led him to cancel the premiere of the second musical vision he had already written, titled Ramon Llull with text by Magí Morera (1853–1927).

Besides the main program of lyric theater, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner also offered extraordinary sessions and some exclusive passes of non-musical theater performances, as well as seasons of musical concerts. Graner relied on the help from Adrià Gual as stage director to choose the program for the dramatic sessions. As for the musical concerts, Graner established a network of collaborations with other musical entities from the city, like the choir led by Lluís Millet (1867–1941) and the orchestra conducted by Joan Lamote de Grignon (1872–1949), to hold their concerts at the Principal theater. He not only leased the venue for them to perform but actually arranged conjoined events in which the Graner header often appeared on the printed programs.

Within this network of collaborators, it is worth noting two relevant aspects. Firstly, how Graner's project worked as a hub that boosted the early career of young artists that were barely beginning to write, like Jaume Pahissa and Josep Carner at that moment, as well as it happened with actors such as Josep Santpere (1875–1939). He also gave the chance to women creators like Narcisa Freixas or Carme Karr (1875–1943) to produce their pieces at the Principal theater, despite the harsh critiques the latter had written about Graner on the press. Consequently, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner became a generational melting pot, in which senior artists and renowned names from the Renaixença period, such as Àngel Guimerà and Felip Pedrell, were able to work and network with the young Modernists that would later on transition to the Neoclassical Noucentisme. Secondly, Graner managed to gather under his umbrella artists that were ideologically and personally in very distant positions, now involved in one same project in favor of national culture. The most notorious case would be that of socialist Enric Morera, who could not stand Catholic Lluís Millet, while also holding a personal feud with Felip Pedrell, now all of them collaborators of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

The first season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, which was inaugurated on October 14th, 1905, focused its lyric theater offering on the genre of musical visions. Graner's intention was to materialize the popular imagery on stage, to give "the little folks at home a bit of ideal and of dream; of vision (through the humble crack of the small mind) of august, superior, and unknown things[170]". For this reason, Graner asked for Gual's initial help to bring his popular theater works to the stage and to stage an entire regular season at the Principal theater[171].

In this way, a season was structured with diversity of form and content, but with a solid and coherent theoretical background that structured the entire repertoire. These works were called "musical visions", "plastic tableaux", or "folk songs harmonized for the stage", among others, but they all responded to the popular spirit that Gual had conceived under the idea of his "popular theater".

Following this ideal, the musical visions produced during the 1905/06 season at the Principal theater would correspond to staged folk songs such as La presó de Lleida and Els tres tambors [The three drummers]; to legendary visions such as Lo miracle del Tallat [The miracle of Tallat] and Fra Garí [Friar Garí]; and to staged folktales like La Fustots [170] As quoted in BELTRÁN, Clara (2020): Oleguer Junyent i Sans, pintor-escenógrafo…, op. cit., p. 307 [originally in Catalan].

[Cinderella]. As well, the dramatic vision Donzella qui va a la guerra [Damsel that goes to war] included a folk song in the piece. As for La nit de Nadal [Christmas Eve], it was not be a proper legend, but a religious story, that of the birth of Jesus. Religious and biblical stories were considered part of Catalan Catholic folklore to be staged.

In the case of El comte l'Arnau [Count Arnau], a legend and a folk song that deal with the same theme converge at the same time, arranged as the plot and music for the stage version. This "legendary vision" opened the season, generating great success due to its spectacular staging, which used colored lights, special effects, and even pyrotechnics on stage. The genre held a strong pictorial and visual character, based on the suggestion and creation of different atmospheres through the senses by combining visual, musical, and poetic effects, to which the audience was not accustomed. In titles whose dramaturgy was more rooted in the plastic and visual part along poetic texts, such as La matinada or La Nit de Nadal, critics pointed out the lack of dramatic action and narrative development, which is actually characteristic of avant-gardist Symbolism.

Despite Graner's interest on collaborating with Gual and premiering his harmonized folk songs for the stage, he left the company's team at the end of the season after an argument with Graner about the financial imbalance the theater was causing him. As director of the Teatre Íntim, Gual was aware of the budgetary dramas involved in theater production and did not want to be part of the financial ruin he foresaw for his friend Graner. The playwright recalls the events in his autobiography suggesting that he was actually dismissed by the impresario, who didn't contact him for the renewal of his contract for the following season[172].

For the second season, with Modest Urgell taking over as stage director, there is a shift towards comic genres, bringing together different theatrical trends within Catalan culture while moving away from the focus on musical visions that characterized the first season. Thus, a greater diversity of genres would be included in the season program. Musical visions will now include more action and will be closer to lyric drama, becoming more dramatic instead of suggestive. They were alternated with operettas or lyrical comedies, lyric dramas such as the tale La santa espina [The holy thorn], and even large-scale operas closer to Wagnerian style were included, such as Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel.

We can still find the hallmark of musical visions, such as La dama d'Aragó [The lady of Aragon] and La resurrecció de Llàtzer [The resurrection of Lazarus]. However, these were interspersed with lyrical dramas that maintain the company's characteristic thematic line whether religious or legendary, as with Gaziel and Nit de Reis [The Three Wise Men eve]), fables developed as large-scale lyric works like La santa espina and La nina dormida al bosc [The girl sleeping at the woods]) and also musical comedies, many of them adaptations or "transplants" into Catalan of French works, such as Permeti'm! [Allow me!], Innocència [Innocence] and L'ajudant [The helper].

In January, La santa espina, written by Àngel Guimerà with music by Enric Morera, kicked off the second half of the season and captured much of the attention, remaining on the theater's billboard for the rest of the season. La santa espina was presented as a lyric fable or folktale in 3 acts, divided into 8 different scenes, each one with its own backdrop and stage set. It became not only the greatest success of the season, but one of the most memorable productions of Catalan lyric theater overall.

Following the topics and aesthetics of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner after Graner's commission, La santa espina brought into one same piece all the different elements that made up the popular imagery of Catalanism. Rural ambiences and bucolic characters recalling the folk roots of Catalan identity; castles, knights and nobility from idealized medieval times; religious references to Catholic culture like the holy thorn that gives its name to the piece, as well as fantastic characters including witches and demons from hell.

Starting in a rural Catalan masia, the shepherd Gueridó is shown in love with Maria, who does not correspond him. Running away from the house, Gueridó is found in a mountainous valley by a group of witches and demons that kidnap him. They take him to prince Arnolt's palace, where they force him to accept Gueridó as the new sovereign of the crown recently left vacant after the death of his father. Tricking the court and the nation, Gueridó will replace Arnolt pretending it's him.

In this move, the "new" sovereign will start ignoring Rosa Vera, Arnolt's beloved one, in the search for a proper wife. Nevertheless, Gueridó can't forget about his life in town with Maria and no other damsel can attract him. He will first reject a group of Moore women and their oriental dance dedicated to Allah. However, he will feel appealed when they bring him a group of Catalan women to choose a wife from them, who dance the renowned sardana with patriotic lyrics that already start by saying: "we will be Catalan peoples, either if you like it or not". Gueridó finds Maria between them and asks for their wedding to be prepared.

Behind his back, Rosa Vera is planning revenge on him for taking Arnolt's throne and converting him with a spell on a palm tree. When Maria explains her concern about wanting to go home, Rosa Vera reveals to her how Gueridó has become an evil man tricking everyone and taking Arnolt from her. They ask him to swear it's not true on the holy thorn that Maria had given him back at home. To break the evil spell, Maria kisses him, making the witches run away and the palm trees from the castle's garden transform again into the prince and his knights. Gueridó and Maria start their way back to Catalonia.

Tradition, folk culture, magic and fantastic spell mix into highly symbolic references to the nationalist imagery. The piece became a great success, since different branches of Catalanism, from traditionalism to republicanism, could find element they were able to resignify according to their ideological vision of Catalan identity. Catholic references are present, in the form of the holy thorn and the rejection of Islamic people; as well, love for the land and the culture of its people is present. While nobiliary references exist, Gueridó eventually rejects the crown over the desire to go back to his Catalan home, proving love for the motherland is stronger than any throne. As well, Morera's sardana became the unofficial anthem of Catalonia, still widely played by folk ensembles and choirs until this day.

To celebrate the 100th performance of La santa espina, a new musical vision was commissioned from the same authors. Although El cavaller Sant Jordi was initially announced, the authors finally delivered an adaptation of a scene from their drama Jesús de Nazaret (1894) adding a couple of new musical numbers, entitled La resurrecció de Llàtzer. Looking ahead to spring, Ton i Guida (the Catalan translation of Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel) and La nina dormida al bosc by Manuel de Montoliu (1877–1961) and Frederic Alfonso (1879–1946) renewed the repertoire, maintaining the format of large-scale lyrical fables.

This was the moment of greatest prestige and visibility for the company. Numerous articles about La santa espina and La nina dormida al bosc appeared in newspapers, even in the ones edited in Madrid, including photographs of scenes from the plays, which showcased the Espectacles-Audicions Graner as one of the main promoters of Catalan theater. It is also worth noting the amount of promotional material that was published for La santa espina (photographs, postcards, portraits, etc.) and the publication of the score for the sardana number, which still lives on in the musical imagination of Catalonia.

Despite the success of some of its productions, the company owner's financial problems and debts grew due to the shows' losses. According to some accounts, the success of La santa espina was also the company's downfall, because the number of musicians and actors needed on stage to perform it generated enormous expenses that even sold-out tickets revenue could not cover with such low seat prices. In addition, the programming of large-scale lyric fables forced a reduction in the number of daily sessions due to their longer length, which also meant fewer tickets sold.

This paradigmatic case can be used to reinforce the argument that the financial bankruptcy of the company was not due to poor artistic productions and the lack of public or popularity, as it had been suggested until now, but due to a business model that was structurally loss-making, in which even the sold-out sessions presented insufficient box income to cover the costs generated by each performance. The enforced policies of low-priced tickets to facilitate the access to the middle and working classes to a high-quality Catalan culture, along with the activist attitude of the impresario dedicated to invest his fortune to the national cause reviving its cultural attractive (as it was characteristic from the lyric movement, as Morera had done himself with his Teatre Líric Català) were not financially sustainable to be maintained in time without additional external income and sponsorship.

Titles such as La santa espina achieved the goal of creating symbolic references for the national culture that would persist on the popular imagery, as the recognized sardana from this piece proves, having become a national anthem until these days. They did not generate economic, but rather symbolic capital, which was the ultimate goal of the nationalist activists working in the cultural field.

Moving to the third season, the commitment to comedic productions that had already been hinted at during the previous season was consolidated, leaving musical visions in a secondary place in favor of musical comedies. Lluís Graner's departure from the company's artistic direction and the new stage direction led by actor Enric Giménez favored this change in programming. Until then, the stage directors had been painters, which had a more plastic and poetic vision. In addition, during the spring of 1908, the company ended up abandoning musical shows altogether in favor of only-spoken theater.

The program announced at the beginning of the season already planned a mix of "visions and operettas," declaring the intention to promote the comic musical repertoire. In November, the press confirmed that Lluís Graner was no longer the artistic director of the Principal theater for this season, but it is unclear to what extent he had prepared or mediated to structure the upcoming program. Be that as it may, the planned balance was destabilized, with the removal of several musical vision titles from production, many of which had already been written.

Commissions for musical visions that had been already written (like Barcelona by J. Lapeira) were abandoned, as were the revivals of pre-existing titles that had not yet been premiered (such was the case of L'estudiant de Vic [The student from Vic] by Adrià Gual). Even some titles that had been announced during the season as upcoming premieres, as La filla del carmesí [The Crimson Lord's daughter] by Manuel Marinel·lo and Amadeu Argelaga, never made it to the stage.

Comedies stand out, from Els entremaliats, A peu pla, No diguis blat... and La dida seca to the bilingual parody for April Fools' Day, Il castello di Malastruga. Some of them were old works written years ago and left unperformed, such as Les roselles [The poppies]

(a 1900 manuscript probably written for Morera's season of Teatre Líric Català) or some comedies included in the Teatre Aulés subscription. Others were translations and adaptations, mostly from French, such as T'estimo! [I love you!] and Com unes malves [Like mallows], both by Lluís Puiggarí (1862–1926).

Besides the comedic genre, we can highlight El fill del rei [The King's son] as a musical vision staging a folk song, Joan de l'Ós [Bear John] as a lyric fable, and Rodamon [Vagabond] as a drama with legendary and medieval air. Religious and Christmas-themed works are still present in this season, but they now have a more comical and narrative tone, as in the case of El portal de Betlem [Bethlehem's portal] by Alfons Maseras and Adrià Esquerrà, definitively abandoning the poetic and evocative dramaturgy of earlier seasons. Works depicting local customs also adopt a comedic tone approaching the genre of operetta, such as Els gendarmes o qui vigila no dorm [The police officers or who guards doesn't sleep] by Josep Morató and Celestí Sadurní, that familiarizes the public with the Catalan dialect of what's considered "Northern Catalonia" (currently Southeastern France) through a comic plot of policemen investigating the theft of hens in a farm.

The winter program focused on the reprise of La santa espina and the successful premiere of La reina vella [The old queen], once again betting on the Morera-Guimerà duo. In La reina vella, Guimerà presents a lyric drama with a similar approach to La santa espina: a mix of rural, religious and nobiliary elements that are combined to reinforce that love for the land is over the power of any title and richness of any palace.

The character of the old queen, played by Maria Morera (1872–1954) (whose dress would become iconic in popular culture of the moment), recalls her childhood as a secret refugee in a Catalan rural town when she's in her last days. She makes the court take her to that town looking for the family that hosted her after such a long time and offers wealth and luxury to repay them, but they don't need them anymore. Instead, she helps them plant the seeds for the new harvest season with her own hands and dies there, happily redeeming herself with physical work on the fields. Again, Catholic moral values of redemption are present, while also workers' revindications of labor being more noble than monarch's wealth are notable.

Enric Morera's public profile at the Principal theater was such at this time that even the Liceu opera house attempted to counterprogram the new premiere of La reina vella with a reprise of Morera's opera Empòrium, which, however, was not very successful due to a lack of investment in the production. The Romea theater had also done such scheduling the premiere of musical drama El mestre [The teacher], by Pompeu Crehuet (1881–1941) and music by Morera, in January 1907, at the same time that La santa espina was being premiered at the Principal theater.

As for musical visions, the last ones premiered were El miracle de santa Agnès [Saint Agnès's miracle], La llar [Home], and El testament d'Amèlia [Amèlia's will], and they were poorly received. They were criticized for their technical quality and dramaturgical inconsistencies, forcing some fragments of the texts to be rewritten after opening night. None of them, in fact, were published in the collection of librettos edited by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

The 1907/08 season particularly promoted seasonal passes for private evenings, which were organized by entities of great ideological diversity that had gathered around the Principal theater since the beginning of the aforementioned Solidaritat Catalana nationalist coalition. The fall and winter programming hosted evenings dedicated to the members of the Centre Nacionalista Republicà [Nationalist Republican Centre] and the Joventut Carlista [Carlist Youth] on different days of the week, the latter even celebrating the Don Carlos de Borbón Day at the Principal theater.

The spring program featured only-spoken theater performances. The orchestra was probably dismissed entirely, and some afternoon sessions were even devoted solely to cinema. Nevertheless, the company's financial problems continued to worsen irremediably, accumulating more debts that ended up jeopardizing the payment of the theater's rent. The following season 1908/09, Graner made his definitive departure from the theater. He transferred the venue's management to Antoni Niubó and Enrique Vinyals, although he had to continue ultimately responsible for the financial results and the payment of the theater's rent, as he was the signatory of the lease contract. For the remaining two seasons, the theater's marquee changed its header to "Teatre Català," dropping the surname "Graner" from the company's name. The same troupe of actors remained as the resident company, now directed by Jaume Borràs (ca. 1875–1949), but the orchestra remained dismissed, officially abandoning musical and lyrical theater programming.

Following the termination of the lease contract of the Principal theater in 1910, and confronted with the impossibility of meeting the payments still owed, Lluís Graner found himself compelled to emigrate to America seeking exile until practically the end of his life[173]. His return to Barcelona in 1928, 18 years after his departure, was celebrated and met with widespread enthusiasm by the press. The painter provided an account of his life in Barcelona, acknowledging that, despite the great artistic and economic success of the Mercè hall, the Principal theater project had irreparably ruined his finances. Despite the company's considerable bankruptcy, it had provided the city with a major theatrical attraction that was chronicled by the press for decades as one of the major milestones of Catalan theater in the city and as the primary project for the institutionalization of Catalan lyric theater. During its three-season run, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner staged a total of 55 lyrical theater productions in Catalan.

[173] For further insights on Graner's activity in America, see: ALCOLEA ALBERO, Fernando (2014): "El pintor Lluis Graner en América. Gloria y decadencia (1910–1928)". Self-published in Academia.edu.

❖ Scattering of the lyric movement (1910–1920)

Once Lluís Graner left Barcelona and the legacy of his Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater stopped producing lyric theater, the conglomerate of Catalan authors and intellectuals, and the network of associations that worked together in the project got spread and disseminated their forces. The state of the national lyric project found itself at the starting point, with no established company nor theater dedicated to the genre, no stable institutions, no pedagogical project to train new actors, and a deep internal division on how to proceed and what genre support or not.

However, the people involved in the movement still worked on the lyric field, even if there was no fixed or agreed conjunct line of action. Multiple individual initiatives still took place, authors continued writing and lyric actors continued working and offering performances. Some reinvented themselves, like Adrià Gual and his Nova Empresa de Teatre Català [New Company of Catalan Theater], created in 1908 and established at the Novetats theater, as well as becoming a cinematographic director and scriptwriter. Others, like Enric Morera, desperate for the lack of cultural progress, left expecting a brighter future abroad, coming back later after finding out that not much was actually waiting for them.

There was an attempt to reprise the mythical Teatre Líric Català project with another season at the Teatre Espanyol, with not much more economic success than the previous attempts. The lyric professionals, however, did not give up, and some of them created independent travelling companies, like Assumpció Paricio and Artur Balot (1879–1959), who announced themselves in 1915 as a Catalan comic-lyric company, keeping in repertoire multiple titles from the lyric companies they had been part of, like the Teatre Líric Català and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

There were also multiple individual productions of new lyric titles, like Liliana, by Apel·les Mestres and Enric Granados in 1911, and the titles that were premiered at the "teatre de la natura", like Flors de cingle, Canigó and La viola d'or. A few extraordinary productions of Catalan opera also took place, including titles such as La dona d'aigua by Cassià Casademont (1875–1963) in 1911 and Gal·la Placídia by Jaume Pahissa in 1913.

Once all these initiatives are gathered, what seemed like an empty picture during the decade of the 1910s, becomes now a splattered landscape with several productions, performances, and new titles premiered in the genres of opera, lyric drama and even some fairytale-like and legendary pieces heirs of Graner's Symbolist shows. The fact that no official enterprise held the name of "Catalan Lyric Theater" and that the movement was not centralized in a single institution as it had been the prior case does not mean that it was not fertile and fruitful.

- The Teatre Líric Català reprise

When Graner finally left the Principal theater in 1910 and the Catalan company he had supported started to be dismantled, some of his previous collaborators gathered to join their forced and maintain the Catalan lyric project alive. Morera was trying his luck in Argentina, Graner was exiled in America due to his debts, Gual had retaken his own personal projects out of the musical field, and Baldomer Marinel·lo, the lead actor of the Mercè hall, tried to carry out his own personal project on a small scale, continuing the programming of musical visions at the Imperi hall. However, some people still remained interested in bringing the Teatre Líric Català project back to life.

The project was led by Artur Balot and Folch i Capdevila as impresarios[174], while Bruno Güell (known librettist for musical comedies in Spanish) acted as artistic director and Josep Santpere as lead actor of the company. Firstly, an initial short season took place at the Teatre Espanyol, located at the Paral·lel avenue, starting in January 20th, 1910. Great expectation was caused on the press, announcing that the most relevant names from Catalan lyric theater would be among the company's cast, like Maria Morera, Assumpció Paricio, Josep Santpere and Joaquim Viñas, as well as a repertoire including pieces of renowned Guimerà, Rusiñol, Iglésias and Mestres[175].

The season was eventually based on reprises of past successful lyric titles from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner and the previous Teatre Líric Català seasons from 1901 and 1903. They reprised recent works premiered by Graner like La reina vella, La santa espina, Permeti'm!, Els gendarmes and Les roselles, as well as La reina del cor and Picarol from Morera's 1901 season, and La barca, from the 1903 season organized by Foment del Teatre Líric Català. Nevertheless, it seems that some of the most renowned names of the cast were late joining the company and that the new productions were neither up to Graner's standard in the plastic aspect[176], since the former impresario had spent huge amounts of money in rich artistic sets that were difficult to equal. The project lasted for about three weeks, halting on February 7th so the impresarios could rethink their plan.

It seems that Artur Balot, an actor from Graner's company, was the main promoter of the project. Looking at the success of minor genres in Catalan language that were flourishing along the Paral·lel avenue, he considered that the future of the Catalan lyric theater project resided at that avenue, reconnecting with the most popular audience. This led him to rent the newly built Teatre Espanyol for their new lyric attempt. In an open letter to Ignasi Iglésias published in December 1911, Balot explains his vision about the management of the lyric movement, criticizing that Catalanist intellectuals had worried too much about aesthetic and theoretical reflections, missing out the audience real needs[177].

According to Balot, popular comedies, revues and variety shows at the Paral·lel avenue led by Pilar Martí, Raquel Meller, Josep Bergés and Josep Santpere were of great success in terms of attendance and revenue, being able to pay salaries to their crew that the Romea theater playing dramas had not been even close to pay, even despite the greater expenses these shows had at the Paral·lel avenue, having to pay for orchestras, choirs and exclusive rights of the pieces. Therefore, programming in Catalan, with Catalan actors and actresses, was possible and economically viable, they just needed to reconnect with the true needs of the audience, understand the socioeconomic panorama of the city and act in consequence. Therefore, after Graner's failed attempt to consolidate an artistic and moralizing lyric theater, they decided to go back to Morera's original approach of promoting a Catalan comic operetta, that would naturally appeal the audience, being able to offer low ticket prices while maintaining the economical balance of the company.

Nevertheless, the new lyric season faced the usual known problem: the lack of new professional repertoire to offer. As Balot states, during their short stay at the Teatre Espanyol, people went to watch again the pieces they programmed even if they had already been scheduled over one or two hundred times at the Principal theater. There was a popular interest on the lyric repertoire, but they did not equal the quality of the very recent Graner's productions and didn't have anything new to offer[178]. Despite their interest on the popular audience in the Paral·lel avenue, shortly after the start of their season, the empresarios decided to move their company to the Granvia theater at the Eixample of the city, as they had been told the bourgeois families of the neighborhood would provide a warmer welcome to Graner's reprised repertoire.

It took them two weeks to move from one theater to the other, and on February 26th, they reopened the Teatre Líric Català season at the Granvia theater. Josep Santpere would be the stage director and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe took the role of musical conductor. This time, besides the reprises of successful canonic repertoire that would still continue, new pieces would also be staged. As Graner had done at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, in order to provide the audience with renewed programs, they started premiering pieces that were already written but had not been performed yet. For example, they put on stage La presó de Xauxa [The prison in Xauxa], with text by Apel·les Mestres and music by Borràs de Palau, which had been already announced by Graner's company but eventually not performed.

The opening of the season was advertised with the great premiere of comic-lyric revue La veu del poble i el poble de la veu [The people's voice and the voice's people], divided in 16 scenes that would mock trendy events of the moment, with 6 new stage decorations. Sitting for the opening would be 2 pesetas and a general entry, 55 cents; later on, sitting would be announced at 60 cents and a general entry at 25 cents. As in previous lyric seasons, they would arrange the performances in multiple short sessions throughout the afternoon and evening, with varied programs for each session[179]. The painters in charge of the decorations of the season would be Ros i Güell and Foch[180]. They also premiered La festa major [The major festivity], with text by Manau i Avellanet and music by Cassià Casademont, on March 9th; vaudeville Comiat de solteria [Bachelor party], by Reittmyer and Casademont, on March 11th; and vaudeville in 2 acts Vilacalmosa [Calmed-ville], by Avelí Artís and music by Carles Oró on March 17th.

The farewell performance of the company that closed the season, took place on March 20th, 1910[181]. According to Balot's review, their expectations of a higher attendance to the shows at the Granvia theater was not met; in fact, they received less public that they did at the Paral·lel avenue, even if they did not premiere any new repertoire there. Some of the announced new pieces did not eventually make it to the stage, such as Els miquelets d'Olesa [The Miquelet militia from Olesa], by Apel·les Mestres and Celestí Sadurní. Also Modistes i estudiants [Dressmakers and students] by Nogueras Oller and Espadaler, Somnis [Dreams] by Modest Urgell and Frederic Alfonso, and El fielato [The octroi] by Rusiñol and Sadurní had been announced as part of the future repertoire to be premiered by the Teatre Líric Català[182]. For the Easter season, the company had planned to travel for a short stay at the Euterpe theater in Sabadell to reprise there the most acclaimed titles from their repertoire, like L'alegria que passa, La santa espina and La reina vella[183].

- Travelling companies and individual lyric productions

One of the individual figures that continued making efforts to promote Catalan lyric theater, as he had been doing since the beginning of his career, was Enric Morera. After his huge success across the different theaters of Barcelona, with La santa espina and La reina vella at the Principal theater, but also multiple operas like Empòrium and Bruniselda at the Liceu opera house, Morera had reached immense international recognition, but his pockets were empty after Graner's departure, losing the stable income he received from their lyric collaborations. He received then an offer from Argentina, where he was raised as a kid, to compose the commemorative anthem for the 100th anniversary of Argentinian independence. Following this collaboration, the Argentinian Republic's president, Figueroa Alcorta, asked Morera to write the statutes of the to-be new National Conservatory and offered him the role of director[184].

With these expectations in mind, Morera moved to Argentina along with his family, taking the steamboat La Argentina in August 1909. The composer's departure was an event announced across the national press, including journals from Madrid[185]. Apparently, he also left with the idea of directing a lyric season in Argentina, premiering in this country some of his pieces like La santa espina. Some sources also indicate that he took with him the scores of unpublished pieces such as his opera Titaina and the lyric version of Àngel Guimerà's drama Mar i cel, and that he intended to compose an opera based on Argentinian traditions and customs[186]. As well, he had with him the musical illustrations he had written for Shakespeare's The taming of the shrew[187] and the music for Firaire, a comic-lyric piece that he had written for his 1901 Teatre Líric Català season that had eventually not been premiered[188].

He received financial support from Antoni Freixa, a Catalan businessman settled in Argentina, and he rented the Avenida de Mayo theater to stage his lyric season. However, it seems that the Argentinian audience did not welcome too well his project and that the lyric season he directed was, again, short and an economic failure. Since the project for the Argentinian National Conservatory was not an imminent reality neither, Morera decided to go back to Barcelona and he resettled in the Catalan capital on September 1911[189].

Soon after Morera's return to Catalonia, multiple events were organized to welcome him, especially promoted by his colleague Ignasi Iglésias. One of the remarkable ones that took place in the following months was the Festes de Glorificació del Teatre Regional [Festival for the Glorification of Regional Theater], celebrated on December 31st, 1911, in La Bisbal. The event was announced as a tribute to compatriots Àngel Guimerà, Santiago Rusiñol, Ignasi Iglésias and Enric Morera.

A whole day of celebrations, meetings and meals was organized, culminating in a gala performance at the Principal theater of la Bisbal, in which the lyric titles of the musical vision La resurrecció de Llàtzer (by Guimerà and Morera), the lyric comedy La reina del cor (by Iglésias and Morera) and the lyric drama La nit de l'amor (by Rusiñol and Morera) were performed.

The whole program was made of Morera's lyric pieces, played by an orchestra with 30 instruments, conducted by Cassià Casademont[190]. The event was another proof of the afterlife that the lyric repertoire from the Teatre Líric Català and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner had despite the collapse of the institutionalized enterprises.

The following day, on January 1st, 1912, the opera La dona d'aigua [Aloja or Undine], written by Cassià Casademont, was reprised at the same theater in La Bisbal. The piece had been premiered a few months earlier, on June 21st, 1911, at the Eldorado theater. The libretto had been written in 1909 by Joan Trias as a "lyric poem with a prologue and three acts". It was based on a folk legend about the river pool of Vallderròs, in Riells del Fai, and it's full of fantastic characters, with the Catalan mythological undine as the main one that is used to title the piece. The artistic director for the premiere was Francesc Casanovas and the stage set was made by Domènec Soler i Gili. The main undine was played by Emilia Viñas, while the main male character was played by Maties Pasqual. It's worth noting also Conrad Giralt, who had been a member of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner company, playing the old shepherd. The chorus of reapers was played by the members of the choir Catalunya Nova, and the chorus of undines, by the members of the choir from the Catholic Academy of Sabadell[191].

The legend that the opera was based on is similar to the one used by Massó i Torrents for the libretto of La fada, premiered in 1897 with music by Enric Morera. In Trias's version, the queen of the undines actually leaves with the heir of Viaplana in the prologue and the three acts develop their frustrated love story. The first act takes place ten years later. In it, they are presented as a happy family with three daughters, living with the old shepherd that assists the heir. After the shepherd tells the girls stories from the river pool, the heir leaves to look for reapers to collect the harvest.

In the second act, while the heir is gone, a witch appears from a flute that the shepherd has made and summons a storm. The undine calls for the reapers that have just arrived to quickly collect all the wheat before it gets wet. Eventually it doesn't rain, but the wheat was still green. When the heir arrives and sees that because of her bad decision the whole harvest is lost, he curses on the undine as a demonic creature and she disappears. In the third act, they all travel to the river pool trying to find her. From the bottom of the pool, she calls her daughters, that decide to join her and sink in the pool to never come back. The heir is left alone, regretting that now he has no harvest and no family.

The opera, therefore, presents characters from Catalan mythology and bases the plot on a folkloric legend. As well, the symphonic prelude includes Catalan folk themes. Moreover, it also includes symbolic elements linked to Catalan identity such as the reapers, which are mentioned in the Catalan anthem Els segadors [The reapers]. The play takes place in the 17th century, which is the context of the Reaper's War, also known as Catalan Revolution, which is also the topic the Catalan anthem is based on. As well, bucolic elements as the old shepherd and manual work in the fields are included, which remind very much to the imagery used in previous lyric dramas commissioned by Lluís Graner for his shows, like La reina vella, written by Guimerà.

Other lyric pieces premiered during these years as individual productions out of a lyric season are also worth mentioning. One of these cases is Liliana, by Apel·les Mestres and Enric Granados. As Mestres called it, this "dramatic poem" was premiered on July 9th, 1911, conducted by Jaume Pahissa at the Palau de Belles Arts as part of the events organized for the International Arts Exhibition taking place in Barcelona. It was an arrangement of a longer narrative poem written by Mestres in 1907, now adapted for the stage[192]. Initially, the piece to be premiered was Margaridó, a libretto Mestres had finished years ago and that had been programmed at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, eventually discarded from the season because the music had not been written in time. In this occasion, the same happened, and Amadeu Vives eventually did not write the music for the piece. Instead, Mestres had to quickly arrange his previous poem in a matter of days[193].

The main character of the piece is the fairy Liliana, and the three gnomes that fight for her love. Mestres draw the sketches for the wardrobe design of each character, picturing a fantastic world full of magical creatures, with sylphs, frogs and many other living animals, as well as the fairies and gnomes. The stage direction was in charge of Josep Santpere, who played one of the gnomes. Carles Capdevila and Lluís Puiggarí played the other two gnomes, and Artur Balot was the king of the sylphs. They had all been members of Graner's company. In fact, the press remembered the fantastic lyric pieces performed at the Principal theater when watching Liliana:

> "Without fear of being wrong, we can say, then, that the great set designers Moragas and Alarma presented a pair of lush forest backdrops in which reality beautifully intertwines with fantasy, producing a splendid effect, one that invites dreaming. […]
> Indeed, Moragas and Alarma possess the secret of those fanciful spectacles that formed the basis of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, from the ones born in the limited stage of the Mercè hall to those that later flourished in the larger Principal theater. And what can be said of Moragas and Alarma can also be said of Vilomara, that other eminent set designer who honors our land and to whom we owe the last of the three beautiful sets for Liliana[194]."

The three scenes of the piece present a forest and the river pool where Liliana lives. An important emphasis on the lighting effects was also made when imitating the sunlight shining on the forest and the moonlight with shining stars in the sky.

Throughout the piece, the three gnomes will offer material gifts to Liliana to win her love. However, she will meet Flor-de-Lli, the king of the sylphs, half flower and half dragonfly. They fall deeply in love, even if she's a water creature and his element is the air. Eventually, Liliana leaves the river pool with him, teaching the moral lesson that true love wins over material wealth. Scholars like Alexandre Plana and Walter Aaron Clark point towards a connection between Mestres's view of the fantastic world of nature and German Romantic tradition, in which nature is spiritualized and animals are humanized[195].

The nature of Mestres text is mostly poetic, with very little sections of dialogue. Statism is one of the key characteristics of Mestres's style, related to Symbolist dramaturgy. As for Granados, his music includes from choral numbers (as choruses with predictable refrains), songs (following a strophic form) to dance pieces, and multiple sections of melodrama in which the characters speak over instrumental music. The first song sung by Liliana is especially remarkable, a hymn about the sun rising over the mountains giving birth to the new day[196]. This very symbolic element had been used in previous lyric pieces, such as La matinada, and even the logo for the Teatre Líric Català project. The following Liliana's songs imitate folk-styled melodies, with a plain vocal line design and the use of decorative triplets[197]. The final number is also worth noting. This chorus of sylphs is written as a farandole, a folk rhythm from South France popularized by Bizet's L'Arlésienne (1872)[198]. A parade of different fantastic characters appears on stage, which was very praised by the critics. However, the conditions for the performance, the summer heat and the behavior of the public didn't allow for a full enjoyment of such a poetic and intimate piece and it was not reprised afterwards.

Another remarkable title premiered during these years was Gal·la Placídia, by Jaume Pahissa, which was heard in public for the first time in 1913 at the Liceu opera house. Pahissa, who had started his career as composer for the stage with Adrià Gual at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, approached now the operatic field with a version of Àngel Guimerà's tragedy based on the historical character of Galla Placidia and the Goth kingdom that had its capital in Barcelona in the 5th century. The original tragedy had been premiered in 1897 at the Novetats theater and now Pahissa arranged himself the text for the libretto of his opera[199]. He basically reduced the dimensions of the text but did not alter much the fragments that he kept for the opera.

The tragedy is based on the war between the Goths and the Roman Empire in 416, with Galla Placidia as the central character. In a previous battle, Ataulfo, the king of the Goths, rescued Galla Placidia and took her with him to his palace, away from her natal Rome. Actually, it had been Vernulfo, another soldier, who had rescued her and given her to the king as a trophy, but she didn't know, and now he feels regret and resentment. Galla Placidia secretly loves him and despises the king. When the Romans plan to attack Barcelona to rescue her, she stands with them. She eventually declares her love to Vernulfo, who's helping the Romans with the secret attack. Once he's helped her escape in the ship, he feels a traitor to his motherland and poisons himself, not without killing the Goth king before dying. However, Galla Placidia has not escaped. Her ship has been captured, and the Goth people kill her in an act of fury against her.

Apparently, he started writing the music in 1906, when two short fragments of the music were played in public, during the Graner era, but only finished the whole piece by December 1912. The composer stated in public that he was influenced by the Wagnerian ideal of musical drama and the structural use of leitmotifs throughout the piece. Among Pahissa's leitmotifs, the motif for Ataulfo and the Goths, Placídia's love motif, the one for Sigerico, and the conspiration motif are especially remarkable. However, he limited his influence to a formal aspect, looking for the sound of Latin identity in the music rather than Germanic sounds. He looked then for a brighter sound, clearer and more proportionate, in accordance with the harmonious and proportionate character of Latin tradition[200].

Among other contemporary composers that also looked to Wagner's ideal, Pahissa succeeded the best, diluting musical numbers into a continuous orchestral flow of music. As well, the Expressionist influence from the coetaneous Germanic scene can also be seen. As Casares indicates, Pahissa's orchestration is closer to Richard Strauss's influence than Wagner's. As well, Pahissa experiments with the theory of intertonality, which was being promoted by the Expressionist school led by Schönberg. He instrumentalizes harmony to create expressive and descriptive ambiences in the scene, for which he uses elaborated polyphonic textures and systemic dissonances. He got to the point where no musical themes can be identified. He dispensed with autonomous melodies and looked for an abstract and free melodic flow, similar to Wagner's "endless melody"[201].

As for Enric Morera's production, once back in Catalonia, his opera Titaina was premiered at the Liceu opera house in 1912[202], and the Spanish version of The taming of the shrew with Morera's music was premiered at the Tívoli theater of Barcelona, becoming a great success. The premiere in 1914 at the Teatre Nou of the lyric version of La Baldirona, a comedy written by Guimerà in 1892, took place afterwards, and his lyric drama Tassarba, with text by Juli Vallmitjana, would follow in 1916 at the Liceu opera house[203].

With these pieces, Morera's work leaves behind a period dedicated to fantasy, mythology and medieval legends sponsored by Graner to get closer to verism and realism with titles that deal with present-life social and ethnic issues. Titaina is based on the exploitation of a gypsy woman and the love and compassion felt by a local man that gets to meet her, Eudald. In an ending similar to Terra baixa [Lowlands], by the same Àngel Guimerà, the lover that sexually exploits her will be killed. Quotations of folk songs are used in some fragments of the piece. As for Tassarba, it's also based on a love conflict with gypsy characters, depicting their traditions and nomadic way of life. Gypsy folk dances are performed around the fire of their cave, that has to be always burning. When Tassarba accepts to hide a fugitive thief and falls in love with him, the fire will extinguish its flame as a symbol of her lost purity. They are eventually caught and, to save them, Tassarba's mother will falsely confess the crime, condemned by the rest of gypsies to burn in the fire.

Besides these individual productions, some companies formed by lyric actors and actresses maintained the existing musical repertoire in their program. Given the lack of a fixed and stable institution dedicated to Catalan lyric theater during this decade, they announced themselves as travelling companies to be hired by provincial theaters across Catalonia. This was the case, for example of Assumpció Paricio. She had worked in the first Teatre Líric Català season in 1901, at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the 1910 reprise of the Teatre Líric Català, and was now ruling her own travelling company along Artur Balot, who had already tried his luck in 1910 as lyric theater impresario.

A flyer announcing their company can be found at the archive of the Centre de Lectura in Reus, received in March 1915. Among many other titles of spoken theater, they announced several selected titles of "Catalan Lyric Theater" from the repertoire they had learned in the previous years. Some remarkable ones are La reina del cor, L'alegria que passa, La Rosons and Picarol (from the 1901 Teatre Líric Català season), and La santa espina, Pierrot lladre, La sardana dels promesos, Permeti'm, Els entremaliats and Nit de Reis (from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner), as well as plenty of short musical comedies. They recommended organizing sessions that combined movie projections with a short lyric piece at the end, what would reduce the production expenses for the contractors, following the business model practiced by the network of small halls dedicated to musical visions, like the Mercè hall.

Other actors kept some lyric titles as well in the repertoire of their travelling companies. Joaquim Viñas was one of these cases. The actor, who had embodied the clown of L'alegria que passa in its premiere for Morera's 1901 season, kept this piece in repertoire. In 1916, he included it in the program for his tour that stopped at the Centre de Lectura in Reus. On the farewell performance in January 1917, he performed L'alegria que passa[204]. The popularity that the piece still held was revived and soon after a musical recording of (at least) the march for the cart's arrival was recorded in vinyl (ca. 1917–1918)[205].

- Lyric works in the "Teatre de la Natura"

The Modernist "teatre de la natura" or "theater of nature" project was one of the contexts in which some new lyric pieces had the change to be premiered. The project of staging theater in nature, outside the conventional theatrical spaces of the city, relates to the idea that performer and spectator had to establish a symbiotic relation through a spiritual communion. The moment of the performance was mystified, and nature was a perfect place in which emotions could be channeled between both agents to illuminate the masses in a place of purity. A given place of admiration such as nature was conceived as the perfect spot to contemplate humanly created culture[206].

At the same time, the open space provided a place of freedom for Catalan authors that would not depend on the will of theater impresarios. After Graner left the direction of the Principal theater, Ramon Franqueza (d. 1924) took over the position and eventually reconverted the theater's programming line into a Castilian repertoire, against the will of the residing company. This dispute led to the company to take action and get rid of the impresario, as will be further explained in chapter 8. Actor Jaume Borràs presented a better bid at the tender once Franqueza's contract was over, but the theater suspiciously got on fire before the new director could start operating.

Franqueza also confronted Catalan authors that wanted to stage their pieces at the Principal theater in Catalan. Franqueza lent the Principal theater during the summer of 1911 to playwright Ignasi Iglésias but eventually forbid the essays of his dramatic poem Flors de cingle* [Flowers of a rocky mass], with music by Cassià Casademont, stating that Catalan titles would ruin the assistance to his upcoming season of Castilian theater. This event led to a chain reaction, in which other authors like Rusiñol and Guimerà denied Franqueza the right to perform their pieces at his theaters, eventually causing the creation of the Catalan Dramatic Authors Union. Authors like Enric Borràs (1863–1957) and Margarida Xirgu (1888–1969) also tried to boycott Franqueza's season[207].

Flors de cingle was eventually premiered on September 3rd, 1911, initiating the "teatre de la natura" project at the forest of Can Tarrés, in La Garriga[208]. The performance was a huge success that was widely reported in the Catalan and Castilian press, printing several photographs in different journals and editing plenty of postcards. The press reported that the estimated audience amounted to between 6,000 and 8,000 spectators[209]. A film about the event was recorded by Gaumont and fragments are preserved at the Filmoteca de Catalunya in which the arrival of the audience, the actors and the author of the text can be seen[210]. On February 24th, 1912, the piece was reprised at the Eldorado theater, directed by Jaume Borràs under the sponsorship of the Catalan Dramatic Authors Union.

The stage design for the production of Flors de cingle was done by painters Miquel Moragas (1842–1916) and Salvador Alarma (1870–1941), while the sketches for the wardrobe design were drawn by Apel·les Mestres. They envisioned a bucolic staging that the press praised for its effect while being performed in the forest, matching very well the nature of the place chosen for the occasion. Even a flock of sheep led by a little boy with a dog as shepherd appears on stage. The piece develops the impossible love of Segimon, a shepherd boy, and Pietat. The story is told in a natural environment, locating the action in the Congost valley, by the Bertí rock mass. The title given to the piece symbolizes the difficulties of this love, as flowers that grow between the rocks, and the spring scenes that the piece starts with symbolize the joy of a young love, in contrast with the parents of the lovers and the blind grandmother, that can't even see it anymore[211]. The piece included five choruses and two soloist songs written by Cassià Casademont.

The second open-air production in La Garriga was premiered on August 30th, 1914. Subtitled as a "rondalla bosquetana" or "forest tale", La viola d'or [The golden viola] was a lyric drama written by Apel·les Mestres, with music by Enric Morera and stage direction led by Adrià Gual. The sketches for the wardrobe design were drawn by Mestres himself, and the music was conducted during the performance by Morera. The composer also brough several of his close actors and actresses that had already played in previous lyric projects, such as the 1901 Teatre Líric Català season and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, like Assumpció Paricio, Josep Santpere and Artur Balot.

The plot of the piece is located in a village during the 18th century and its surrounding forest. The piece starts with an introduction by a troubadour speaking to the audience, announcing the beginning of the play. The first act takes place in the deep forest, starting with a chorus of villagers picking flowers from the communal forest to decorate their houses. Inhabitants are set at odds with the village's mayor because of his authoritarian behavior. He wants to marry his daughter with a military commandant, while the young troubadour, who sings sad ballads to the people with his viola, is in love with her. A circus troupe arrives then at the forest with cheerful songs and colorful dresses, cheering up the people while announcing their performance. A general chorus calls to attend the performance at the main square.

Once alone, the mayor's daughter appears and reunites with the troubadour, who declares she's the cause of his sad songs, because their love is hopeless. When the mayor catches them, he condemns the young man to death at the gibbet. However, when everyone has left, the flowers at the forest start dancing to suggestive musical notes and magical creates populate the scene, closing the first act. The second act starts with the forest's fairy under the shape of an old lady encountering the troubadour. Since he generously agrees to help her, she grants him a wish: that his viola would make everyone that listens to it dance.

The fairy then turns his viola golden while gnomes start dancing around them. However, the mayor and the commandant find him and arrest him.

In the third act, the gibbet is shown in the middle of the stage, where the troubadour is supposedly going to be hanged. People start arriving at the act while singing a chorus. Once everything is ready to execute the sentence, the young man asks as his last wish to play his viola. Everyone then starts cheerfully dancing, including the mayor, and the troubadour manages to escape and meet his lover. The fairy and the rest of fantastic creatures celebrate the victory of Love and Poetry.

The play, therefore, combines numbers of verisimilar music, played by the troubadour, the circus company and sung by the people while working, and also incidental music announcing the arrivals of military troupes. As well, some choruses are sung as non-diegetic interventions. One of the novelties of the piece lay on Morera's orchestration. Although he reorchestrated the piece for its commercial production at the Principal theater of Barcelona during the season that followed the summer premiere, the original score was written for the traditional Catalan ensemble called cobla, made of a flabiol [folk flute], a tabor or small drum, two tibles and two tenoras [similar to oboes], two trumpets, two flugel horns and double basses, including also a solo violin.

The play is in line with the folk fairytale aesthetic of previous lyric dramas by Mestres staged at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, like Joan de l'Ós [Bear John]. Mestres designed personifications of nature through the characters of flowers and insects coming to life in the forest, in line with the Modernist praise to nature. As appointed at the very end by the fairy, the human characters of the piece also have a very symbolic value: the young troubadour represents Poetry and Love through his music and his connection with nature, while the mayor represents authoritarian oppression, backed by the military forces. The Symbolist interpretation of the piece reassembles some of Rusiñol's lyric dramas, like L'alegria que passa, in which Poetry is represented by musical circus troupes that face the rejection of political power, expelled by the mayor of the grey town condemned to "eternal Prose".

Another lyric work that was premiered as part of the theater of nature project, but this time performed in Figueres, was the lyric tragedy Canigó. This piece reunited Graner's initial artistic team shortly after the cease of his project at the Principal theater. Josep Carner arranged the original poem by Jacint Verdaguer, Jaume Pahissa wrote musical sections to merge with the spoken parts, and Adrià Gual was in charge of the stage design. This trio had already worked together; for instance, in 1908, for the Catalan production of Shakespeare's A midsummer night's dream [El somni d'una nit d'estiu]. Carner had been in charge of the literary translation, Pahissa conducted some musical fragments by Mendelssohn as incidental music, and Gual was in charge of the stage design[212].

Moreover, the cover for the edition of the libretto, designed and signed by Adrià Gual, is clearly inspired in the header of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner that crowned the façade of the Principal theater during Graner's period of activity and that appeared on his collection of published librettos. The publication of this piece, produced by a group of artists that had received special support from Graner to start their artistic careers, was definitely a tribute to the former artistic director of the Principal theater.

Its premiere in 1909 had to be cancelled due to bad weather conditions that the night before ruined the stage set, but in June 1910 it was finally performed as the final act to conclude the fairs taking place in Figueres[213]. Canigó was announced on the press as a "vision of nature", as some other musical visions had been subtitled. The backdrops were painted by renowned scenographers Moragas and Alarma, following Gual's design, and they pictured the mountain of Canigó, which gives name to the lyric drama, and which is geographically located close to Figueres[214].

The lyric tragedy is based on a legend that Verdaguer poeticized and that now Carner adapts for the stage. Similarly to the repertoire of musical visions based on Catalan mythology, the imagery of the play includes Catalan medieval aristocracy and religious references about the defense of Christendom. The different acts, with the use of music and dance numbers that are integrated into the action with verisimilitude, are based on the evocation of different moods and patriotic feelings.

In the first act, Gentil has just been named chevalier at the chapel of Saint Martin of Canigó. Troupes of shepherds, ladies and music players arrive singing and dancing sardanas to celebrate. Griselda, the queen of fairies (pretending to be a shepherd), is in love with him, but Gentil's father does not agree with this union and forbids her to see his son again. On the meantime, new parades arrive to celebrate bringing lit torches while dancing, but a messenger arrives with news that the Moors are arriving to their shore. The celebrating mood changes to war chants in defense of their religion and lands.

In the second act, Gentil arrives to the chapel with his squire, who is explaining that he visited the castle looking for Griselda with little luck, but that he saw plenty of fairies on the top of the Pyrinee mountains. Then, the rocks on the side of the mountain open up and the fairies appear singing and enchant Gentil. The fairies dance and intonate a chorus quoting the folk song Muntanyes regalades [Gifted mountains], which mentions the mountain of Canigó. Then, another messenger arrives with the news that they had lost the battle against the Moors, which awakes Gentil from the spell. The fairies, then, continue chanting, but this time it's a lament about their lost land, and they cast a new spell for a tempest to start and stop the Moors from climbing their mountain.

The third act starts with a shepherd singing again the folk song Muntanyes regalades. The scene is located again by the chapel, where Gentil's uncle is asking for counsel to redeem his guilt for killing his nephew during the battle. Gentil's squire arrives with his corpse and his father demands revenge, but the priest intervenes saying that, in God's name, he has pardoned the killer. Griselda arrives to say goodbye to his loved one, asking to build a monastery on that place to honor the death of Gentil. The fairies sing a chorus followed by another one sung by the warriors about their motherland in the Pyrinees.

While Pahissa presented modern harmonic modulations that in later pieces were developed as an intertonal technique, he used the traditional Romantic orchestration and his melodies present no dissonant intervals, sticking to the major and minor modes[215]. The music found in this lyric tragedy is based on the quotation and harmonization of a folk song, rhythms of the Catalan traditional dance of sardanas, as well as some choruses and incidental celebrative music, which are used to bring on the stage folk instrument players and popular traditions such as the torch dancers. It is mostly inserted following the verisimilitude of the action, which is placed in a mythological medievalist ambience including fantastic creatures from Catalan mythology. Therefore, it follows the line initiated by the genre of musical visions and lyric dramas produced at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, like La santa espina [The holy thorn], in which medievalism, religious references, fantastic mythological creatures and national folk references are intertwined.

The whole nationalist imagery is put together in the same piece, which works as a political statement about the historical legitimacy of Catalan nationality since medieval times, intrinsically Catholic, and also as a claim to the belonging of Southeastern France to the Catalan historical nation, since the mountain of Canigó, a strongly symbolic place for Catalan cultural identity, is in the present day part of the French state. French citizens also attended the premiere in Figueres.

Following Gual's precedents, the piece denotes a stillness in its action: the fights, wars and major events are not represented on stage, but narrated by the characters. Each scene, instead, is based on the evocation of a general emotion: from the initial celebration to the middle folk spell and the final grief, while a patriotic feeling in which religious faith and nationalist pride are intrinsically combined. However, as Gual had learned from his initial Symbolist folk songs arranged for the stage, the scenes shall include more narrative content in order for the audience to understand the plot and understand the action taking place in an easier way. This evolution had already taken place in Gual's dramaturgy, from his initial Blancaflor to his latter L'estudiant de Vic [The student from Vic]. Thus, the lyric tragedy Canigó is rather a continuation of this lyric tradition, following its same imagery and dramaturgical construction.

Right after its premiere at the bull ring of Figueres with a single performance on June 12th, 1910, the production was taken to the bull ring of Las Arenas in Barcelona[216], where it was performed from June 19th to June 24th.

Another case in which Gual's dramaturgical vision regarding the staging of folklore can be appreciated is the case of the opera La princesa Margarida [Princess Margaret], the prolonged operatic version of 1905 musical vision La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida], produced by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Although it was premiered much later than the studied period, it's a case worth mentioning due to how it portrays the evolution of the genre according to Gual's perspectives.

According to different testimonies, Gual already had arranged La presó de Lleida as a three-act opera when the musical vision was premiered[217]. It could have been Graner's insistence on the short Symbolist format which had led to the shortening of the text, while Gual already had clear the necessity to dramatically develop the plots to adjust to the audience's taste. For Pahissa, who had already received some commissions by Gual to write short incidental compositions, La presó de Lleida was his first full orchestral composition. More than 20 years later, the three-act version of the musical vision was brought back to life and Pahissa extended the composition as a fully sung opera. However, the composer stated in 1928, the year of the premiere, that the idea of converting the piece into a fully musical opera was his[218].

As Pahissa stated to the press, the operatic version was an extension of the original musical vision. The project followed so closely the original version from the Principal theater that the stage design for the 5 different scenes was exactly the same as the one used for the 1905 production. The musical motifs and themes remained the same ones, only prolonging them and orchestrating the parts in between the main musical numbers, and the poetic nature of the text remained as in the first version. The piece was elaborated following the lyrics and melody of the homonymous folk song, whose motifs reappear throughout the piece as a unifier of the musical structure. Other motifs that appeared were original, but Pahissa intentionally tried to imitate a folk-like sonority to match the character of the original folk song. For the composer, it was vital to keep the original folk sonority overall, above the musical compositional modernity that it could show[219].

The premiere took place on February 8th, 1928, at the Gran Teatre del Liceu and it was subsequently reprised during the 1929/30, 1930/31 and 1935/36 seasons. It was performed a total of 9 times at the Liceu opera house[220].

❖ The last Teatre Líric Català attempt (1921–1923)

By the beginning of the 1920s, the interest in Catalan lyric theater can still be seen in some extraordinary performances and short seasons given by amateur associations. For instance, in the II Catalan Culture Festival organized at the Tívoli theater in 1921, which aimed to donate the profits to Catalan schools. Among folk and choral singing, "the jewels of Catalan Lyric Theater" were also performed: L'alegria que passa with the mythic Joaquim Viñas as clown, and the musical vision La presó de Lleida, played by an orchestra made of 60 musicians conducted by Emili Acevedo and stage direction by Enric Beut[221].

The Easter season of 1922 organized at the Círcol Instructiu i Recreatiu of Caldes de Montbui was mostly dedicated to Catalan lyric theater, "due to the good reception that the town of Caldes has given to this kind of shows[222]". The dramatic section of the association, along with a choir of men and children and the Valls quartet performed the pieces under the conduction of Joan Valls. The stage sets were in charge of Bartomeu Fàbregas. Given the lack of new titles during the past years, most of the titles announced belonged to the Teatre Líric Català and Espectacles-Audicions Graner repertoire: Joan de l'Ós, La santa espina, L'alegria que passa, La barca, La nit de l'amor and La viola d'or.

In this context, a new attempt to revive the Teatre Líric Català project took place involving Enric Morera in the programming and artistic direction of the season. The leader of the Catalan-Spanish Lyric Company that would take care of said performances would be this time Josep Bergés, known as "the king of the Paral·lel", the main avenue in Barcelona where all the operetta and comic zarzuela performances were located. Bergés joined forces in September 1921 with Josep Santpere —who had been one of the lead actors of Lluís Graner's productions— to set up a company that started performing at the Novetats and Espanyol theaters[223].

Their success led them to embark in the production of a whole season of musical theater at the Tívoli theater, reviving Morera's Teatre Líric Català. The composer was still very interested in the promotion of Catalan lyric theater and had not given up on the idea. Despite not being able to count on the support of past collaborators, who were not interested anymore in the project, Morera's friends encouraged him to continue composing more pieces, since one of the known major issues for the promotion of Catalan lyric theater was the lack of new professional titles and the renewal of the canonic repertoire. According to Morera's autobiography, it was his friend Lluís Reig who took care of everything: he managed to rent in February 1922 the Tívoli theater under the name of the Teatre Líric enterprise, linked Morera with the company and impresario Bergés that would materialize the lyric season, and encouraged him to write new music, even if it had to be based on old classics from Catalan theater due to the lack of new librettos[224].

Already with the project of a new Teatre Líric Català season in mind due in the forthcoming autumn, the new team started already to work together in new lyric pieces. Among their first productions, it's worth noting Baixant de la Font del Gat o La Marieta de l'ull viu [Going down the Cat's Fountain or Marieta of the bright eyes] a tragic comedy in 3 acts inspired by the homonymous popular song, with text by Josep Amich "Amichatis" (1888–1965) and Gastó Màntua (1878–1947), and music by Enric Morera. The piece was premiered in April 15th, 1922, at the Espanyol theater and it was announced as an "evocation of life in Barcelona in 1840", depicting popular urban characters and recreating on stage the location of the Cat's Fountain in the Montjuïc mountain in Barcelona. The piece includes, as the most remarkable musical numbers, a popular couplet based on an original source from 18th century and ends with a sardana that would become popular as an independent musical number when it was premiered in 1926 with added choral lyrics. The production became so popular that in 1927 a movie version was released arranged by the same authors and including the same cast. In 1929, a new version of the couplet sang by Càndida Pérez was published in the compilation El llibre del cuplet català[225] that apparently had been sung since 1920, showing that the piece became a paradigmatic case of intermediality and cultural transfer.

In October 1922, the new season took off at the Tívoli theater. The great premiere the season started with was Don Joan de Serrallonga, with music by Enric Morera and a libretto arranged by Francesc Pujols (1882–1962) based on Víctor Balaguer's original drama from 1858. According to Morera, impresario Josep Bergés had a very correct idea on how the piece should be during the supervision of the rehearsals and it met with the public's taste very easily, remaining in the program for long.

The Spanish-Catalan Lyric Company in charge of the performance also counted with a great cast: Bergés was in charge of the stage direction and renowned singers like Emili Sagi Barba, Josefina Buatto, Amparo Ferràndiz, Miquel Pedrola, Lluís Zanón, Miquel Sirvent and Lluís Alcalà were in charge of the acting. As well, young Emili Vendrell debuted in Don Joan de Serrallonga, starting what would be a very long career in musical theater[226].

Remarkable musical numbers from the play were also recorded on that same year in a gramophone edition by renowned label La voz de su amo[227], something very rare among lyric theater productions, which proves the popularity the piece reached. The libretto was also published by editor Salvador Bonavia (1876–1925) as the first number of a new collection of Catalan lyric theater publications as a supplement of journal La escena catalana.

As researcher Antoni Font has reconstructed, the season counted with 26 titles of musical theater that were produced between October 1922 and January 1923, when the project came to an end[228]. As well, the company counted with 35 live individual performers, as well as a choir and a creative, directing and technical team, which surpassed the average dimensions of other similar companies[229]. From what can be seen in the surviving scores, the music was written for full symphonic orchestra.

The first 10 productions were Catalan titles, some new ones and some others reprises of previous repertoire. Morera's La santa espina and La Baldinora, with text by Guimerà, and his Nit de reis with libretto by Apel·les Mestres were among the reprised repertoire, as well as other classics like El somni de la innocència by Conrad Colomer and Urbà Fando, and L'esquella de la Torratxa by Pitarra and Joan Sariols. Among the new titles, Morera also wrote music for El castell dels tres dragons [The three dragons' castle], following the same procedure as he had used for the Don Joan, having Pujols arrange Pitarra's classic text from 1865. Bonavia's publishing house also printed in the lyric collection the librettos of the revue L'ou com balla [How does the egg dance (a reference to a popular Easter Catalan tradition)], by Eugeni Duch Salvat and Nugués i Torrens, and Pasqua florida [Flowering Easter] by Rossend Llurba and Càndida Pérez, both produced at the present Teatre Líric Català season.

From then on, the Spanish-Catalan Lyric Company in charge of the season started including pieces from the mainstream Castilian zarzuela repertoire, probably due, in the first place, to the lack of new Catalan repertoire to put on stage (since the reprises of old titles and new productions based on old texts could not hold the interest for too long), and secondly, to the need of reducing costs and increasing the profitability of the enterprise. Popular titles like Bohemios and Maruxa by Amadeu Vives, La alsaciana by Jacinto Guerrero, La tempestad by Ruperto Chapí, and La canción del olvido by Guillemo Fernández-Shaw were part of this second stage of the season. Only two productions in between these Spanish titles were Catalan premieres: Retorn [Return], by Josep Sanxo-Marraco, and Pel teu amor [For your love], by Josep Ribas. Despite their apparent little relevance, researcher Antoni Font has made relevant claims on the popular reception and afterlife especially of song Rosó after Pel teu amor's stage production.

Pel teu amor had a libretto written by Miquel Poal-Aregall (1894–1935) and its music was made of 13 musical numbers composed by Josep Ribas (1882–1934). Among them, Blai's song dedicated to Rosó became a blockbusters and remains until this day a paradigmatic case in the history of Catalan music. The song transcended the theatrical production and became part of the repertoire of popular traditional songs. Font has documented at least 51 different professional recording of this song, since the very first version of 1923 by Emili Vendrell (1893–1962), who premiered it at the Tívoli theater, up until the most recent ones by Catalan contemporary rock quartet Obeses in 2021 and by Roger Berruezo produced by TeatreMusical.cat in 2022. Despite the Civil War period and the immediate postwar crisis during the 1940s, the piece has been often recorded from 1958 on, when Emili Vendrell re-recorded it and brought it back to the public interest.

Remarkable singers, like Conxita Supervía, Marina Rossell and Josep Carreras, have also recorded the song throughout time[230].

As Font states, there has been no other songs in Catalan stage music that has been played generation after generation and arranged to so many different styles as the song Rosó from Pel teu amor[231], only closely followed by Morera's sardana from La santa espina, which is still played today, but mostly following the original version. Rosó is another case proving the great relevance of the public reception and impact that the repertoire of Catalan lyric theater had during the studied period, with usual transfers between popular culture, theater productions and intellectual artistic creation. The movement might not have reached a stable institutionalization, but it did succeed (and greatly) in creating symbolic references that nourished and nurtured Catalan popular culture among mass society, proven by these musical numbers that still resonate in contemporary Catalan popular imagery.

Nevertheless, despite the documented success of some of these new productions, the season did not run for too long, as it had happened with the previous attempts to consolidate the Teatre Líric Català project. As Morera stated, the successful popular reception of the season was confronted by the Catalan intellectual critics, which radically opposed and harshly criticized the project due to its popular character that did not aim to promote an operatic repertoire[232]. Ignasi Iglésias, Morera's colleague, also blames the public campaign against him on the press for the cancellation of the project, as it had similarly happened in 1901[233], which only serves to reinforce the argument that Catalanism was internally segmented and in internal opposition, denying the recognition of other segments if they did not ideologically align with them[234].

After this attempt to consolidate the Teatre Líric Català, no further ones will reach the stage. The 1922/1923 short season already showed the tendencies that Catalan stage music was moving towards. The circle of lyric theater authors that had collaborated with Morera and Graner between 1901–1910 were already out of the scene and not interested in further collaborations, which caused Morera's struggles to be provided with new librettos and pieces to stage during the season. Morera himself had moved to long lyric dramas in multiple acts with his Don Joan de Serrallonga and El castell dels tres dragons, leaving the middle ground of short-format lyric theater abandoned.

During the 1920s, the polarization of Catalan cultural initiatives can already be clearly appreciated. The new generation of authors had either moved its interest to long-format operas or to popular couplet. Some known authors from the lyric movement moved to opera, like Josep Carner with his El giravolt de maig [The somersault of May] (1928) or Jaume Pahissa with his very symbolic adaptation of the musical vision La presó de Lleida into the opera La princesa Margarida (1928). Others promoted popular couplet, revues and other short variety shows, including actor Josep Santpere, who had become known at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner and would now be one of the main names of comic productions at the Paral·lel theaters.

This popular tendency was already assimilated by the promoters of the 1922/23 Teatre Líric Català season, showing a mix of lyric drama, zarzuela and popular short-format pieces. The collaboration of Rossend Llurba (1887–1954) is quite remarkable, since he would become of the main defenders of Catalan music hall, leaving behind the ideas and efforts to consolidate a lyric theater genre and moving to the most popular genres of variety shows[235]:

I believe this genre of cheerful and delightfully captivating art would do a great deal of good for our somewhat austere customs and our penchant for transcendentalism. It is true that our character has not been too prone to these kinds of frivolities, but I assure you that the day we learn to free ourselves from certain conventions that inevitably make us apathetic toward the way of feeling of other peoples so cosmopolitan and a bit more elegant than our own, the Holy Cause of our homeland will have taken a great step forward.

I believe that everything immoral is ugly; and can you tell me what ugliness there is in the mischievous smile of a charming can-can dancer, with red lips and a scorching gaze? Oh! I find a woman's extremely modest neck far uglier —and therefore more immoral— than one with a plunging neckline that shows the whiteness of her flesh to the voracious onlookers who pass by and are lucky enough to catch a glimpse of it. Let's not be hypocrites. More or less, everyone thinks the same as I do, that it would be lovely to know that among these stars of flesh who go through the world scattering the grace of their movements and the sweetness of their songs, there are Catalan ones: I don't know why the memory of Lluïsa de Vignè and Amàlia Molina dressed in our land's typical attire and singing comes to mind:

Therefore, once the activist efforts that characterized the Catalan lyric theater movement died out due to a change of interests in the generational replacement of artistic authors, it eventually transitioned to new claims of establishing a Catalan music hall repertoire[237], leaving behind Graner's moralizing aims and Morera's pedagogical intentions of instructing popular society in artistic taste.

The change of regime and the military dictatorship ruled by Primo de Rivera between 1923 and 1930 did not precisely gave support to regional identity movements or substate nationalisms like the Catalan case was. Therefore, the promotion of Catalan language, which was the main aim of the Catalan lyric theater movement, became prosecuted. The night shows in the theaters and halls along the Paral·lel avenue operating in the margins of the system would become a rather more optimal space for the new nationalist activists[238].

Once the corporativist dictatorship collapsed, the II Spanish Republic that was proclaimed in 1931 provided again freedom and public recognition to regional identities and other nationalist movements within Spain. Apparently, in this context of recovered freedom and self-government after the restauration of the Medieval Catalan administration known as Generalitat de Catalunya, Enric Morera tried, already in the last years of his life, to ensure public participation of the new Catalan administration in the revival of the Teatre Líric Català project. Other artists like Antoni Ros i Güell also revived projects from the glorious years of the Catalan lyric theater movement, like he did reopening the grottos of the Mercè hall in 1933 at the Olympia theater, still maintaining the original reference and even reprising one of Graner's installations.

Very little scholar attention has been paid to this project, since Morera published his autobiography in 1936 before these discussions had taken place. From what can be read in his personal correspondence, he achieved that same year an agreement with the Generalitat to be provided with public money to fund a new season[239]. However, the Spanish Civil War started very shortly after, cancelling the project and dooming all Catalan cultural initiatives that did not align with the fascist vision of centralized Spanish nationalism.

Despite multiple attempts aimed to consolidate a stable company of Catalan lyric theater, the movement never achieved a solid institutionalization. However, the interest and willingness to continue promoting the project remained alive for over two decades. From composers, playwrights and actors, to even painters, multiple figures from Catalan arts and culture dedicated their efforts and fortunes to the promotion of a national genre of Catalan lyric theater. Among the multiple difficulties they faced, the following should be highlighted:

[238] For a further insight on the theatrical activity at the Paral·lel avenue, see: MOLNER I CLOSAS, Eduard (2023): El Paral·lel fent país, 1894–1936. Barcelona: Institut del Teatre / Diputació de Barcelona / Arola Editors.

- the internal division of the Catalanist movement into opposed segments that differed on how the new genre should be and attacked each other,
- the lack of professional authors willing to involve in the creation of new pieces,
- and the problems to consolidate business dynamics that focused the project in a single recognizable venue that facilitated the consolidation of a stable flow of audience.

Nevertheless, the different lyric projects that took place under the name of Teatre Líric Català or Espectacles-Audicions Graner were not a complete failure. Each short lyric season, despite ending up in economic loses for the impresarios, served to renovate and renew the Catalan lyric repertoire, providing new pieces for the companies and amateur troupes across the region that were actually interested on performing musical theater in Catalan language. This effort may not translate into economic wins, but it achieved the nationalist goal of creating a common popular imagery made of symbols of Catalan culture. The circus march from L'alegria que passa, the sardana from La santa espina, the iconic dress from Maria Morera playing the old queen in La reina vella, princess Margarida walking down the stairs in La presó de Lleida, or the cursed horse running across the stage in El comte l'Arnau became iconic references of a urban Catalan culture. It gathered people around a common national ideal, bringing the mass audience towards the Catalan national project and familiarizing them with the cultural symbols that made up Catalan national identity: its language, its customs and folklore, and its historical past through old legends and fables.

This chapter has focused on documenting and categorizing the professional initiatives within the movement, from the official companies that tried to run full lyric seasons, to the professional premieres of individual pieces, trying to identify and delineate the different stages of the movement's evolution. However, a whole parallel scene full of musical theater in Catalan language was also taking place in out of the professional field, played by amateur troupes in nationalist and religious civic centers in multiple municipalities across Catalonia. Outside of the nationalist and intellectual movement of Catalan lyric theater that aimed to establish a national canonic repertoire, provincial theaters and local companies wrote several amateur pieces and performed what probably would be hundreds of comic operettas in Catalan, usually called "Catalan zarzuelas", leaving behind the ideological distinction between the Catalan and Castilian genres. This repertoire, though, is still largely unstudied and has received extremely little scholar attention[240].

As well, the chapter has mostly focused on authors and impresarios, but actors should be already taken into consideration for their committed involvement in the lyric project, which could not have taken place without their participation bringing the pieces to life. The efforts made, for instance, by Assumpció Paricio and Artur Balot in 1915 to promote a travelling company of Catalan lyric theater that would continue performing the existing repertoire show the interest that actors had in keeping the movement alive, serving as well as a proof of the audience's interest in Catalan lyric theater, otherwise pragmatic commercial criteria would have made companies drop this repertoire from their programs.

From the field of acting crews, the presence of remarkable female actresses is also worth noting. While there are very few cases of female composers or playwrights, like Narcisa Freixas, when analyzing the involvement and public recognition of actresses, women play a far more relevant role. Female lyric actresses were equally recognized and praised as their male counterparts. Female names were the head of plenty of billboards and publicity promotions, as well as the image in the cover of several journals specialized in performing arts, which shows the audience's affection for these figures.

Some of them developed long careers, like the case of Assumpció Paricio, showing that women could achieve a proper level of professionalization and public recognition within the singing and acting field without facing any gender-based limitations or critiques. Paricio premiered pieces by the greatest authors from Catalan culture, like Guimerà, Rusiñol, Mestres and Morera, always receiving positive feedback for her performances by all kinds of press. Therefore, diversifying the perspectives and approaches to the study of lyric theater does not only enrich the general understanding of its commercial and artistic functioning but also provides a more gender-equal result when including the field of acting, in which women were specially recognized and remarkable. Further research shall be encouraged to deepen this perspective and trace the careers of female lyric actresses who still lack proper biographies.

Chapter 2:
Ideological positions on the national lyric theater genre(s) based on the critique of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner[241]

Figure 63: Add published in the program for the Teatre Líric Català performance of February 24th, 1901, directed by Enric Morera and Ignasi Iglésias. [CDMAE: record 431917].

"—What should I do, dad, to be a good Catalan nationalist?

—Very simple, boy: go with your wife to the Catalan Lyric Theater and take her often to buy bedsheets and white clothes at 56, Pelayo street."

For most sectors of Catalan nationalism, promoting a national lyric theater repertoire to replace foreign genres that were so popular in Catalonia was a key issue. Cultural activism was, at this time, their main tool for spreading their message, reaching people, and promoting a change in their habits and perspectives on identity. Therefore, providing a Catalan-language repertoire was not only a social cause advocating for the use of the local language and removing the influence of the Castilian language from public spaces. It was also an ideological long-range weapon to spread a specific political vision of how Catalan nationality should be understood and seen, in a battle to determine which were the symbolic elements that constituted a cultural genre as "national".

Since musical theater was the dominant form of popular culture at the time, whoever controlled the stages would have the greatest social reach. Thus, different visions aroused regarding how the national lyric theater genre should be, and an internal battle within Catalanism to impose their artistic program was held. Multiple projects competed with each other and aggressive public discussions were held in the opinion press. Therefore, analyzing and categorizing the discourses shown in the press becomes an essential task to understanding the different views held within this lyric movement, because not all of the proposals that they defended succeeded writing and premiering new works. Due to this fact, although the study of the institutionalized companies and of the repertoire premiered on stage is still relevant and necessary, it is incomplete for fully understanding the range of different ideas and aesthetic considerations that existed about this issue.

[241] A preliminary version of this section was presented at: PÉREZ APARICIO, José Miguel (2022): "Posicionamientos del catalanismo en torno a un teatro lírico nacional: la crítica a los Espectáculos-Audiciones Graner", at the conference: X Congreso Internacional MUSPRES: Hacia una historia de la crítica musical en España. Almería: Universidad de Almería (April 28th–30th, 2022).

The situation described above has also caused significant historiographical issues. The intellectual discourses that received the most press coverage were not necessarily the most popular choices for the stage. Consequently, the discourses in the media did not match what the Catalan companies were offering at the theaters. For example, Modernist cultural journals such as Joventut strongly advocated for long-format Wagnerian operas in multiple acts[242], yet the intellectuals promoting this idea barely managed to write Catalan pieces that adhered to this ideal. Meanwhile, Catalan companies and amateur groups widely introduced one-act musical comedies, based on light and entertaining topics and alternating short musical numbers with spoken parts.

In his memoirs, Enric Morera discusses this issue, stating that there were many intellectuals dedicated to art criticism that often commented negatively on the existing Catalan initiatives that did not align with their views. However, these intellectuals were unable to materialize their desired proposals into new compositions:

> "But my triumph at the Catalan Lyric Theater does not sit well with some people. Who could these people that rebel against the evidence be? They are the usual suspects. They are the ones who do nothing. They are the ones who often write articles in their newspapers praising each other. They are the ones who, whenever they can, give speeches talking about themselves and praising each other. They are those who do not produce works because they do not know how, and if they ever try, they reveal their ignorance.
> Like the cripples they are, they work in the shadows, and years and years go by, and the tree of their knowledge never bears fruit, and if it does, it is already dead when it is born. That is why they cannot see me, just as they cannot see anyone who is not part of their brotherhood, who also produces and, with their works, exalts the name of Catalonia. [...] But, impaired for art as they are, their selfishness has never allowed them to see that, even though they were many and had newspapers, magazines, and publications of all kinds at their disposal, they were too incompetent to defeat me. [...]
> Back in 1905, at the Espectacles Graner [...] Some of these works were performed three hundred and four hundred times [...] After premiering all these lyrical works, issue 301 of the Revista musical catalana [Catalan music magazine], in an appeal also signed by Millet and Llongueras, inviting people to a dinner in honor of Vives, says: "... in favor of this unborn Catalan lyrical theater, which is so important to bring out of the realm of desire and turn it into a strong and beautiful reality... […] To deny so clearly and naturally that Catalan lyric theater has been created, and to remain so cool about it, strikes us as funny and makes us laugh[243]."

In order to document the diversity of views that existed on the issue of Catalan lyric theater, a wide sample of press reviews on the topic was needed. Not only did journals specializing in cultural topics and performing arts express their opinions on the matter, but political and religious journals did as well. As this thesis defends, Catalan nationalism was plural and segmented. There were different ideological sectors within the nationalist movement, and its various actors grouped themselves around institutions that shared the same ideological views on national identity. Journalism was one of the main means of expressions of each of these segments[244], bringing together groups of Catalanist intellectuals with shared ideological approaches on the same editorial team. These included Catalan republicanism, traditionalism, Catholic Catalanism, liberalism, modernism or international socialism. The different segments given within this plural nationalist movement were articulated through journals.

Each conceived the national identity based on different symbolic elements and imagined cultural genres that would represent that identity differently. Therefore, analyzing the diversity of the press and identifying the different proposals for the national genre of lyric theater is essential to understanding the pluralistic approach to this topic and why the different genres competed with each other, instead of picturing a unified Catalanism in which everyone worked together on a sole cultural initiative. Analyzing the plurality of opinion sources is also essential to identify the ideological biases in critiques, which often base their opinions on moral or political views rather than on artistic criteria. Such is the case of Joventut cancelling any piece that they considered "moral", while Catholic journals such as La hormiga de oro were claiming for a "moral theater" in Barcelona that families with children could attend.

❖ Reference point: Lluís Graner and his musical visions

As discussed in the previous chapter, the stabilization of Catalan lyric theater companies was generally unsuccessful. The tendency leaned rather towards short, sporadic seasons, without continuity in time or space. The repertoire was not large, the seasons were not consecutive, and there were no stable theaters with a continuous lyric offer that could become a reference for the audience. For instance, the Teatre Líric Català project that Enric Morera started in 1901 at the Tívoli theater only lasted three months. When it was reprised in 1903 by the Foment del Teatre Líric Català association, it took place, only for a few months, at the Principal theater. In 1910, the new season that tried to revive the project was led by Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe and took place between the Teatre Espanyol and the Granvia theater. Morera only returned as the director of the project for the 1922 season organized again at the Tívoli theater.

These irregularities, changes in context, and lapses in space and time make it difficult to systematically analyze how it was received by the press and generalize editorial lines as consolidated aesthetic criteria supported by journals. Too many variants, as well as personal biases and favoritism towards particular authors, operate here. Not to mention the multiple premieres that took place outside of any lyric season as single productions in rented stages, which was the norm for many years. However, there was one serious project aimed at institutionalizing the movement and stabilizing permanent seasons that was partially successful. The Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the project that Lluís Graner carried out at the Principal theater of Barcelona, presented three consecutive and complete seasons of Catalan lyric theater with large-scale productions at the same theater. Moreover, the project had a very defined identity and a clear line of programming.

Graner openly intended for the Symbolist genre of musical visions to become the main lyric offer. His ideological and artistic intentions were very defined and straightforward, which allows us to easily identify his position on how the national lyric genre should be. In consequence, to proceed with the identification of the rest of positionings existing within Catalanism regarding this issue, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner are taken as the fixed point of reference. The different journals and critics will be placed around them according to the reviews they gave of Graner's musical visions, and they will be grouped and categorized based on the criteria they expressed when reviewing these pieces using textual discourse analysis tools.

However, before mapping the rest of positions regarding the Catalan lyric genre, Graner's standpoint has to be clearly defined. He aligned with Catholic and traditionalist colleagues and organizations —like Josep Carner or Joan B. Lambert— to promote the musical visions genre, whose pieces were mainly based on the gloss of folk songs and tales as artistic symbols of the national identity, staged under a modernized form that resulted visually attractive and emotionally suggestive.

> "Catalan song and legend have found in the Espectacles-Audicions Graner a new form of expression that is powerfully contributing to the current resurgence in their popularity. We could almost say that the artistic expression of popular sentiment has reached the peak of its development, were it not for the fact that we can expect more from the current cultural movement and from Graner, as far as this particular expression is concerned.
> That is why the most notable writers, poets, artists, and musicians of our land all contribute to Graner's work, each in their own field of expertise, each with their knowledge of the subject they master. That makes that, in a song that is so well known it no longer affects us, and in a legend that is so commonplace it no longer moves us, we can discover new sources of emotion in its spirit after it has been reincarnated in the imagination of the poet, in the inspiration of the musician, and in the vision of the painter[245]".

The theoretical foundations of the genre are to be found in Adrià Gual's theory of "popular theater", which led to his experimental piece Blancaflor, a "Catalan folk song harmonized for the stage", based on a modernized vision of folklorism through Materlinck's symbolist dramaturgy. Although the piece had been unsuccessfully premiered in 1899, leading to the author's abandonment of the project, Graner revived this proposal in 1904, becoming the temporary leader of the lyric movement in Catalonia.

[245] La Veu de Catalunya 2512 (16/04/1906), morning edition, p. 1 [originally in Catalan].

Graner became the artistic director of the project, with Gual's support as stage director, and redirected the original decadent approach to symbolism towards a vitalist view of the nation, aligned with the Catholic moral preaching. Influenced by the modernity brought by the cinematograph and electric lighting, Graner modernized the staging of folkloric content in an attempt to make it attractive to the urban audience.

The genre of musical visions was, hence, a Catholic and folklorist approach to late Modernism, which worked as a transition point between Catalan Modernisme and the Neoclassical Noucentisme, reintroducing traditional folk content into a modern form as a conservative impulse, later continued by the full restauration of the traditional forms too.

As a brief summary of the characteristics of musical visions that will be further developed in part II, section III of this dissertation, we can remark:

- Short duration (between 20 to 30 minutes long), fitting into one-hour sessions preceded by film screenings.
- Dramaturgy based on the suggestion of emotions through the sensorial combination of music, poetry, lighting and other stage effects, with very little action played on the scenes and no dramatic plot developed.
- Use of electric lighting effects and pyrotechnics, standing out for the technological complexity of the stage settings.
- Based on the gloss of folk songs and traditional legends.
- Multiple biblical and religious references, since Catholicism is considered an intrinsic characteristic of Catalan identity and part of its folklore.
- Exclusive use of the Catalan language as a nationalist cultural revendication.
- Pedagogical purpose regarding Catholic morality, the continuation of the transmission of Catalan folk culture and its traditional values.
- Reduced prices to promote the assistance of urban working classes and families with children.

Therefore, they are formally modern and use the latest stage technology, offering a schedule of sessions adapted to the new audiences. However, they maintain folkloric content as a nationalizing tool and have a moralizing and pedagogical intention according to traditional Catholic values.

❖ From love to hate: classification of editorial lines

Journals from this period were heavily involved in ideological discussions and were openly biased in their opinions. When analyzing the content of cultural reviews, there is an evident lack of technical language regarding the quality and skill of musical composition and theatrical performance, while other more politicized criteria was prevalent. Pieces were often judged based on their ideological, moral and formal alignment with the critic's views. The topics generally discussed in the reviews were:

- (A)moral content of the piece
- Long/short duration
- Inclusion of folk songs quotations or folk-like style of the melodies
- Familiar and childlike pieces or adult complexity
- Use of Catalan language

Besides these criteria, exceptions were made for authors that were close to or belonged to the magazine's editorial circle. For example, Wagnerian Modernist journals were extremely critical with the Espectacles-Audicions Graner and heavily criticized the genre of musical visions for its moral content and short format pieces. However, they were notably benevolent with La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida] due to their sympathies with the authors of this particular piece, Adrià Gual and Jaume Pahissa. The case Federico Urrecha, cultural critic of the news journal El Diluvio, operates in reversed direction. He was generally positive with the musical visions and lyric dramas produced by Graner at the Principal theater, but he shows an especially mocking and insulting tone whenever the composer Adrià Esquerrà authors the piece. Nevertheless, the large number of reviews documented, due to the continuity and long duration of Graner's project, allows us to identify which of them were exceptional within the general editorial line of a journal.

Not all criticism affected the artistic director equally. Lluís Graner was more receptive to certain critical trends than others, which made him adapt his programming to partially include other genres besides his preferred musical visions. He was inflexible in the face of anti-clerical and anti-Catalan criticism. However, Graner included in his following seasons the comic genre due to the close support received by comic playwright and satirical critic Josep Morató. As well, some attempts to include large-format works were done as a concession to the Wagnerian critics, like the production of the opera Hänsel und Gretel by Humperdinck in a Catalan translation, followed by some original lyric dramas trusted to renowned Àngel Guimerà in partnership with composer Enric Morera.

After analyzing all these different aspects, the different newspapers can be classified according to their editorial stance on the musical visions premiered at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, as well as some also produced by Graner at his Mercè hall following the same aesthetics and dramaturgy. They are presented below, ordered from most favorable to least sympathetic, grouped according to the aesthetic and ideological characteristics each group considered most appropriate for the Catalan "national genre". Each section includes the name of the journals that form the category and the name of the critics that author their reviews. Bold letters are used to remark terms or expressions that especially imply the characteristics used to group them into that specific category.

The classification is based on an extensive review of press coverage ranging from general news publications to those specializing in culture, politics, and religion. This approach provides a broader view of how the genre is received by the general public and Catalanist sectors, while previous studies used a narrower scoped sample. The corpus of documented reviews has been processed using critical discourse analysis tools to particularly identify the repeated terms or keywords that define the aesthetic and ideological lines of each newspaper[246].

Illustrated journals were specialized in the divulgation of pictures, drawings and graphic content and their reviews of Graner's productions were very positive. It's worth noting that musical visions were also often referred to as "plastic tableaux" due to the strong component of the plastic arts in the works.

Besides Graner, other musical visions impresarios, like Joaquim Vancells in Terrassa or Francesc Cuixart in Manresa, were also professional painters that entered the performing arts world to approach stage sets design as an extension of their pictorial work. Sometimes they painted themselves the backdrops or the publicity posters, collaborating also with the most renowned painters for this matter.

At a time when electric lighting in theaters was one of the newest technological revolutions, they showed an especially strong interest in experimenting with live lighting design. They played with color and intensity modulation on stage, exploring the effects of these projections on the painted backdrop. Therefore, the world of the plastic arts strongly supported this genre due to its visual innovations and experimentation.

[246] Methodological details were further explained in the "Critical discourse analysis" section within the dissertation's "Methodology" chapter.

Conceptually, Graner's proposal aligns with the magazines' pictorial and visual interests. Both advocate for theater to offer a high level of artistic achievement and be accessible to the general public to raise cultural awareness. The theater section of La Ilustració catalana, in particular, published photographs coming almost exclusively from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner[247]. These journals are, actually, the primary source of graphical documentation of scenography designs through the multiple stage pictures they printed in their publications.

The religious press was another major defensive bastion among the media, publicly supporting the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. The content of musical visions included moral reflections (heaven always wins against hell, praying is a good habit that will help you fight evil, being good with others will be repaid, etc.), as well as heavenly characters like angels that perform miracles. As well, episodes from the Bible (especially stories related to Christmas and Jesus's birth) and legends about Catholic saints were staged as musical visions, since the promoters considered Catholic folklore to be an intrinsic part of Catalan identity.

These shows were a major attraction for religious audiences, including canons and priests, for which Graner's venues were the only theaters they were allowed to visit due to their moral decency. In addition, Graner's spectacular life-size nativity scenes installed in the Mercè hall were one of the highlights of the city during Christmas season.

The religious media was as well captivated by Graner's project. These journals praised the artistic nature of musical visions due to the artistic refinement of the sets and scenery, while other frivolous shows were not considered "art". The religious-themed dioramas that Graner often set up as complementary installations in the Mercè hall were also positively regarded.

La Academia Calasancia featured a large number of musical visions reviews and descriptions, particularly from the 1905/06 season. After that, theater reviews became less common in the journal. La hormiga de oro —which counted between collaborators with Sebastián J. Carner while his son was hired as a fixed literary arranger for Graner's musical visions— fiercely defended this project as the necessary implementation of a moral theater in the city[248]. They even published some photographs of the shows praising their artistic richness. La Cruz, published in Tarragona, also played a role in promoting these shows in the region of Tarragona, where some of Graner's works were later performed.

> "The artist Graner, in putting into practice his great idea of exhibiting plastic and musical tableaux under the name of Shows and Auditions, apparently set himself several goals, among them the moralization of "Theater", since we had reached an extreme where immorality and bad habits had completely invaded the stage in the most blatant way. He has achieved this, as his theater presents performances that exemplify all virtues, so he has acted very well. It is a pity that he does not offer sessions exclusively for the working class at greatly reduced prices, in competition with immoral theaters, which we have no doubt would be very popular and would both moralize and enlighten the workers.

[…] May Mr. Graner continue his commendable work of educating and entertaining us with the varied selection of films he shows us; may he continue to always close the session with the irreplaceable plastic tableau, sometimes depicting Catalan customs, sometimes legendary motifs, sometimes historical events, and sometimes religious beliefs and scenes from the life of Jesus; if one is good, the next is better; continue alternating between patriotic and religious themes, thus continuing the work of moralizing and creating good patriots, and Barcelona will also continue to shower you with applause, contributing to the success that is achieved with no small effort. "Our readers will recall the series of articles we published last year on the Church and moral and moralizing theater as a powerful educational tool for the people, in view of the alarming and progressive corruption of customs and perversion of ideas that are rapidly undermining the institution of the family and disrupting society. […]

Well, Barcelona has seen the unexpected and sudden emergence of a man who not only has what it takes to undertake such a difficult project on his own, but also to carry it out with such drive that he has taken the lead from the outset. In addition to having enlisted the help of almost all the Fine Arts in the development of his shows, these are truly varied and original.

Ardent zeal, proven competence, astonishing activity, incomparable generosity, universal sympathy —Mr. Graner has brought all of these together, and in one fell swoop has achieved his goal by offering both small and large-scale performances at the elegant dean of our theaters, the Teatre de la Santa Creu. […] It follows, then, that Mr. Graner's work is worthy of the support of the honorable public, not only for its moral goodness, but also for its artistic merit, which alone is enough to deserve the favor of the general public. […]

The fatigue of many individuals engulfed in the struggle for material life to meet the needs of their families calls for rest [...]. And generally, when this need cannot be satisfied with honest entertainment, it is satisfied with whatever is available, however demoralizing it may be [...]. To counteract and reduce this effect, we believe that the children of the Church should consider moral theater not only as a work of Christian and moralizing apostolate, but also as a work of patriotism and civilization.

Well, moral theater is the best (and today the only acceptable) public entertainment that can be provided to decent and honest families [...] who could not attend any of the shows that have existed from some time until today. [...]

Cu-cut! was a satirical magazine[249] that reviewed practically all musical visions. Josep Morató, their theater critic, regularly collaborated with Graner. They agreed on their support for Catalan musical theater and the promotion of the Catalan language, although Morató's predilect genre was comedy. Despite that, he was a fierce defender of Graner in the face of criticism from other anti-Catalan media, which led the painter to include Morató in his creative team, premiering several of his texts at the Principal theater.

Although they endorsed his musical vision, they favored a repertoire of light musical comedy, with jokes and easy humor, similar to the style of Catalan zarzuela. Through their support and persistence, they managed to increasingly introduce comical elements into Graner's seasons, including adaptations of vaudeville and operettas.

Conversely, L'Esquella de la Torratxa[250] did not welcome the musical visions due to its republican and anticlerical stance, as the works often included religious and monarchical references to the princes and aristocrats of medieval Catalonia. However, it did not openly attack the company and generally limited itself to not reviewing its musical visions.

They did publish, however, positive reviews of the productions authored by Adrià Gual and those with music written by Adrià Esquerrà, most likely due to personal affinity. Also lyrical dramas such as Nit de Reis [The Three Kings Night], Pierrot lladre [Pierrot the thief], and La santa espina [The holy thorn], as well as some musical comedies such as Festa complerta [Crowded party] and Joves i vells [Youth and elderly], did receive generally positive reviews.

Josep Morató [...] has developed a scene full of life and color that is interesting and delightful to listen to, as it is based on a semitone of comedy that keeps the audience smiling without the author having to resort to [...] the rudeness that usually constitute the dead weight of productions of this genre.

By the way, I was mistaken on the day of the premiere. When I saw that thin little girl playing such a demanding role, singing couplets and dancing the cake-walk, I thought: "Ow, Graner, you're derailing." And it seems that Graner himself realized this and toned it down a bit in subsequent performances. From bad... to less bad.

As for the rest, the play makes you laugh... a lot. Santpere is as funny as ever, as are Paricio and Morera, and Tor contributes greatly to the overall effect. [...]

"We won't say that the Mercè hall, located on Rambla d'Estudis, is an artistic onion, but rather a daffodil bulb that blooms. It all depends on whether the average audience gets used to smelling it and enjoys its perfume. […] In any case, the Mercè hall is a curiosity in Barcelona, which, thanks to its modest admission price, is within everyone's reach. I don't know if, given its religious nature, some prelate will grant indulgences to those who visit it. What I do know, because I saw it, is that on the day of the inauguration, a lady was very agitated as she left, looking for the holy water font."

"[La sardana dels promesos] It follows the line of visions and, like most of them, its stage concept is meager and passé. The lyrics, written by J. Morató, are nothing more than average. The music by maestro Esquerrà is exquisite and brilliant."

"La santa espina, with lyrics by Guimerà and music by Morera, is undoubtedly the most important artistic work ever produced at Graner's venue. It is clear that Àngel wrote a work for the glory of the set designers rather than for his own. Despite this, the text does not lack the author's genius touch, as he has managed to harmonize the most grotesque scenes with poetic and sentimental touches of the finest taste throughout the work, a quality that is particularly appreciated and valued by audiences who enjoy this genre of show.

La santa espina may not have the unity and naive charm of the comic zarzuelas that were once the favorite genre of the people of Barcelona, but as the child of a great writer and patriot, it is enjoyable for its dialogue, embellished with delicate thoughts, and for the poetry, always homespun, that many of the situations exude.

The music is beautiful; appropriate to the moments, brave, rich in harmonies, and almost always inspired. Some numbers stand out, such as the song of the sword, the chorus of witches, and the sardana, which has a strong Empordà flavor.

And the remaining compliments go to the designers. All the decorations, originally created by our best stage designers, are new and splendid. […] The direction, in the Italian style, is quite good."

Some journals dedicated to the promotion of Catalan culture, literature and music also discussed the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, with more neutral criteria and mixed reviews. La Escena catalana, dedicated to Catalan-language theater, was published by booksellers that held a rather informative and commercial intention. The professional and technical aspects of dramatic art took precedence over the intellectual ones, focusing on the acting skills and the literary ability of the playwright to develop dramatic action.

This newspaper's main criticism was the lack of action and dramatic conflict, due to the close influence of Symbolist drama on musical visions, which were more suggestive and intuitive than traditional action drama. For this reason, La Escena catalana gave greater support to lyrical dramas and comedies, genres that were easier for the average audience to understand and closer to the theatrical tradition known in the professional theater world. It also paid special attention to the cycles of non-musical theater.

Meanwhile, Garba, Catalunya, and Revista musical catalana were favorable towards Graner's shows, likely due to personal reasons. They highlighted the shows' positive and negative aspects without obvious ideological biases or idealizations, though personal interests related to the company were present.

The clearest case would be that of Catalunya[252], which was run by Josep Carner, hired by Graner to adapt and write the texts for his musical visions. This connection could explain why it often presented a favorable review. In the case of Garba, Graner himself was a contributor to the magazine himself. He was also friends with Lluís Millet, founder of the Orfeó Català. The painter had even produced documentary movies about this choir that had been premiered at the Mercè hall, screening rehearsals recorded in Millet's personal house. Therefore, the bulletin of this entity, the Revista musical catalana, would include some positive mentions of Graner's shows, even if brief and discreet.

"On those visions

With the installation of the visions in the Principal and Mercè theaters, a new atmosphere has come to communicate Mr. Graner to the Escena catalana, but only an atmosphere to recreate the eyes, since, relying more on the art plastic arts than on their own efforts, the literary authors have achieved few laurels to date, having believed it a well-trodden path to dully write for the set designer. But since those early visions, advancing further along the path they had taken, at least they have touched upon Catalan lyrical drama, which must be the regenerator of taste par excellence, amid this impure air that surrounds us.

We say they've slightly touched upon it, since all the works performed to date have been nothing more than attempts wrapped up in the title of a song, episode or farce, paying tribute more to the comic genre than to the serious and transcendental genre, some on the verge of falling into vulgarity, becoming, nevertheless, into honorable exceptions in certain works saturated with charming humor and which are as valuable as serious drama of ideas.

And wide open are their doors now to Catalan lyrical art. On the carpet of applause reserved for them by an already initiated audience, our first invigorating productions will soon be performed, the musician will fill the stave with inspiration, the set designer's brush will run across the canvas, without one element predominating over another, the three in unison, the three united, the three pursuing the same goal: the expression of true art.

All that remains is for entrepreneurs to embrace the announced works. Just thinking about it, we already feel a wave of artistic regeneration. [...]". [Most likely, the publication was introducing the upcoming premiere of the three-act lyric drama La santa espina by renowned playwright Àngel Guimerà, which took place on January 19th, 1907, and became a massive popular success].

La Escena catalana 10 (08/12/1906), p. 2 [originally in Catalan].

"The lyrics [of Nit de Nadal (Christmas Eve)], written by the young poet Casas i Amigó, who sadly passed away a few years ago, have given rise to five beautiful scenes, to which the excellent musical compositions of the maestro Lamote de Grignon have been adapted, already applauded by our music-loving audience.

This new musical vision that Graner has offered the public has, as a whole, like all the others premiered to date, an unbeatable visual effect: the set design by Junyent and Vilomara. The combination of lighting, costumes, in short, everything that makes up La Nit de Nadal is treated with a taste that we are not accustomed to here. But it seems that this is not enough to entertain and move the audience, because La Nit de Nadal lacks a common thread, an action that develops and, giving unity to the five scenes, links them together, turning them into a whole... Otherwise, La Nit de Nadal is a beautiful vision to behold and a delight to listen to.

Joan Blancas"

Garba 6 (30/12/1905), p. 22 [originally in Catalan].

"The Espectacles-Audicions Graner were inaugurated in this theater with El Comte l'Arnau. Inspired by the popular Catalan legend, Josep Carner has imagined four scenes which, without the link of a developed plot, as they are simply episodic, vigorously highlight the evil personality of the count, a goal that Carner had undoubtedly set himself and which he has achieved with great success. We will say nothing about the poetry, as that is not our mission. In our opinion, it is of high quality and reflects popular sentiment.

Morera, the composer, has really hit the mark with this piece. His vigorous style, which at times is even striking, fits perfectly with the climactic moments, such as when Count Arnau appears with his entourage of evil spirits. And that's not to say that, when the situation calls for it, notes of tenderness have not flowed from his pen. The song of the Count's daughters in the last scene is of a very gentle freshness, with an enchanting naivety and a well-judged contrast, both before and after the fateful folk song, so that it can be said that this last scene is the most impressive musically speaking. And it is also that the effect is already prepared from the beginning of the work, since, with the exception of the shepherd's gentle flute playing in the second scene, the tones are, in general, somber, if not gloomy.

Let us congratulate Morera, who has managed to strike just the right note throughout the work, without resorting to artificial wisdom or falling into excessive vulgarity, and let us also congratulate Graner, the great artist, on the successful launch of this educational work, which he has undertaken with such dedication."

Despite the trends seen so far, other Catalan nationalist newspapers gave very negative reviews of musical visions and were even aggressively against the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. These were newspapers particularly rooted in post-Romantic Modernism, which only conceived Catalan lyric theater in the form of Wagnerian-style three-act operas.

They were advocates of the long form and of an elaborate literary style with a highly intellectualized approach. Furthermore, some critics, such as Rafel Vallès, were totally opposed to new inventions such as the cinematograph. Their ideology was contrary to morality and they were anticlerical, which is why they explicitly reviled Lluís Graner for his religious beliefs and for being, as Emili Tintorer literally wrote "a moral man". They particularly detested the childish character he imprinted on his productions, rejecting the fantasy and innocence of musical visions, which actually were deliberately aimed at family and children's audiences. Similarly, they detested musical comedy for its lack of literary class and considered easy jokes to be an anti-Catalan prostitution of the language.

Although they agreed on the Catalanist element, their orthodox approach did not accept Lluís Graner's proposals, either because of the modernity of cinematographic screenings in the program or because of his conservative morals. The only thing acceptable to them was the Wagnerian-style opera in three acts. Exceptionally, critics from the three newspapers, such as Pujol i Brull, Emili Vallès, and Plàcid Vidal, were tolerant of young Jaume Pahissa's works. Such was the case with the musical vision La presó de Lleida, written by Adrià Gual, since both authors also had similar expectations of developing this work in a large format.

It is worth noting that, in previous studies of the repertoire of Catalan lyric theater, the reviews from Joventut[253] had been the main source of information and opinion until now, representing a considerable bias due to the radical ideology of the journal's discourse.

> "[...] The tale La Fustots [Catalan version of Cinderella] is so childish and innocent! [...] In short, it's the same old folk tale that lulls children to sleep by exhausting their imagination. What a pity we're not all children anymore! To sum up, a dull, deadly dull session.
> Will it be a precursor for others? [...] Because what is happening at the Principal theater is very sad and dashes many hopes. A man presents himself as an artist of conscience and good faith. This man has money and wants to show it off by making art. Could anything be more commendable? Doesn't this seem like the first step toward the regeneration and elevation of Catalan dramatic art?
> Well, none of that, and do you know why? Because this man, in Graner, is a moral man. A moral man! Let's laugh, what nonsense! A moral man only accepts old things, things that are already established, or modern things that are made in the style of the old, because similarity also consacrates them. And then a lot of imagination, a lot of fantasy, [...] storytelling for children, a lot of empty verses, a lot of pretty words, a lot of colorful spectacle and a lot of beautiful dreams, a lot of naivety, a lot of candor...
> A moral man stages La Fustots for us treating us like children. Fortunately, we are not, and we laugh at his white geese. And he doesn't understand why we have reason to laugh at them. Because we, immoral men, [...] have seen that there are no blue princes and that always eating jam makes your belly fat. [...]

"[...] The most terrible thing is that if he understood nothing about economic management, he understood even less about literature. First of all, Graner immediately showed his sectarian spirit. Sectarian in the double sense of being intolerant of what he believed to be immoral and exclusivist towards certain forms of art. And this double intolerance led him to such extremes that the Espectacles-Audicions Graner were immediately branded as Catholic. Which, although it may not seem so, represents an irreconcilable antithesis. Catholic theater is dead theater. Because not only did the general public and theater lovers not go to Catholic theater, but neither did devout Catholics, since they only went to the theater in exceptional circumstances. [...]

He believed that Barcelona had a large enough core of devout Catholics, with such extreme modesty and such simplicity and naivety of imagination that they were easily satisfied; he believed that the young and old in Barcelona wanted nothing more than toys and simple entertainment. He was wrong. Catholics and children are there to fill the theater every night, but they prefer to entertain themselves at home, because, when you think about it, a theater always has something hellish about it. You almost feel like a rake going to the theater, even if it's Graner's. [...]

"Some time ago, I saw an announcement that Gual had written a three-act drama about La presó de Lleida; some verses from that drama must have been used to dress up the scenes of the vision presented at the Principal theater, but what a joy it would be to see a whole drama, what they call a drama, a major work, in three acts, written by a poet taking inspiration from that tragic event recounted by the people! [...] So, you see how our poets dream of using popular songs to create powerful works, great works?

This is how we believe in the regeneration of Catalan theater, especially in our lyric theater, when we have talents like Pahissa, who rises to the level of the great masters. [...] I will conclude by describing this work as a bridge to achieving what we so desire —our lyric drama— and recommending that all people of good taste go hear it, or more precisely, go see it [...]

"A hateful act is repeated too often. The bragging authors (?) of the short genre do not have enough disgusting us with their tiresome works, they also have to ridicule us, prostitute our language, mixing it with the filth of degenerate slang, thus creating anti-Catalan works. This behavior deserves, not our contempt, because while we despise them, they thrive; but rather an exemplary lesson following the pattern of the scandals at the Tívoli and Nou theaters, attacking such stupidity from the aforementioned authors head-on, until they can no longer be heard around here.

If Catalans understood what patriotism means, they would not tolerate the ridiculous, degrading theatrical genre that we are fighting against.

We must educate, moralize, and clean up our act.

We already have enough trouble with them bashing us from over there; we must not allow this in our own house; we must punish such audacity with vigor."

Lluís Graner had managed to bring together support from contradictory sectors of Catalan nationalism, such as the traditionalists and the republicans. For instance, during the 1907/08 season, the Centre Nacionalista Republicà and the Joventut Carlista —clear political antagonists— both organized cultural subscriptions for their members to attend the Espectacles-Audicions Graner performances, avoiding each other on different days of the week, but consuming the same programs. However, the anti-Catalanist sector could not be silenced and became a firm opponent that attacked him fiercely through its mediatic branches.

The Espectacles-Audicions Graner took place during the years when the Catalanist movement was growing more politicized through Solidaritat Catalana. This political coalition aiming to unify Catalan parties achieved successful electoral results, which eventually led to the rise of voices against Catalanism, as in the case of Alejandro Lerroux. New media outlets emerged to express and divulgate these ideas, like El descamisado, which was mainly used to discredit Catalan nationalist figures and journals[254]. As well, some existing media shifted towards anti-Catalan positions, such as the newspaper La Publicidad, which ended up being directed by Lerroux himself.

These media outlets devoted themselves to harassing Catalanist companies, ideologues, and activists until they brought them down. They opposed any Catalanist project simply because of its nationalist nature, resorting to insults and aggressive, destructive criticism. Although they distinguished between "Catalan" (as they considered the Romea theater) and "Catalan nationalist" (Graner's Principal theater), they were intolerant of anyone who, beyond Catalan regionalism, defended a Catalan nationalist ideology.

"For the sake of art

> As soon as the mystical-theatrical-Catalanish season starts at the Principal theater, an editor from El descamisado will attend the performances, because it is time for them to stop deceiving people and corrupting the atmosphere with a halo of idiocy and artistic misery that is a disgrace to Barcelona.

"We don't need to ridicule Catalanists [Catalan nationalists]; they do that quite well on their own. […] The philosophy of facts clearly shows that Catalanists are reactionary in their ideas and anti-aesthetic in their art. Their theater (we are not referring to Romea, which is Catalan), which is corny, childish, and biblical, lives in the Middle Ages, and as its supreme glory aspires to reproduce the famous autos sacramentales and to have churches as its stage.

Just as one day they bring out the nativity scene of Bethlehem, another the night of the Three Kings, another the discredited cauldrons of Pere Botero, and another, finally, they inaugurate a large manger. The fools who attend such an attraction deserve it!

Of course, it is worth taking the matter seriously and making it known that this is the work of the Jesuits. The curious observer who wastes a few pesos will see what kind of audience attends the show. Priests, bourgeoisie, silly girls, and long-haired punks make up the audience.

This explains why plays such as El mal rico, El conde de l'Arnau, and others that reek of incense are staged. They stink and should be performed in the little theater of the Catholic University of Deusto, where only men perform and dress as women when the role requires it. It is true that they fit better as female than as male."

❖ Recalling Graner's legacy in posterity

The Espectacles-Audicions Graner left a notable sociocultural legacy. Following its bankruptcy, they were even imitated by other venues and companies that emerged based on Graner's programs of film screenings accompanied by musical visions and other children's musical comedies in Catalan. Examples include the Sala Imperi during the period in which Baldomer Marinel·lo was its director, and the Sala Frederic Soler.

During the following decades, they were publicly remembered relatively often. References and commemorative articles can be found up until the 1930s. Visits by foreign companies performing Symbolist theatrical productions, such as those by Martínez Sierra from Madrid, brought back memories of the pioneering Espectacles-Audicions Graner. As well, the premieres of new dramas, with and without music, based on Catalan fantastical mythology or folklore —like Liliana and La viola d'or [The golden viola] by Apel·les Mestres, or La filla del carmesí [Crimson's daughter] by Josep Maria de Sagarra— also caused comparisons with Graner's productions at the Principal theater[255].

Over the years, very different sectors of Catalan nationalism remembered Graner's project for being one of the pioneering companies in institutionalizing their ideals. On the one hand, the Catholic sector, which lost the moral theater reference point it sought to consolidate:

> "Immorality in Barcelona

From the hidden café-concerts to which it was relegated, it has spread to numerous venues that are not so hidden […] But almost worse than pornography is cinema. […] There is also pornography in cinema, and I have already spoken about that. But there are films that, without being pornographic, are highly immoral, as they promote vice and crime. […]

> Shows known today as "attractions" should be installed, genuinely select, of renowned merit and new for the public, which, without any danger to morality, of course, could compete with those presented in today's movie theaters. [...] And the first to be concerned about this should be those practicing Catholics I mentioned, who have been blessed by God with material wealth, thinking that one of the ways to invest that wealth is to seek by all means to clean up a society that is morally dying, suffocated by the tide of filth that is constantly growing, with new refinements of vice. > I cannot do less than dedicate a tribute to Mr. Graner who, with his "Espectacles-Audicions" at the Principal theater of our city sought to cultivate art and morality. However, he had to give up his efforts and retire in view of the losses he was incurring, for three main reasons: he did not take truly strict care of morality, as some of the works presented caused scandal to more than one regular spectator of good faith[256]. Instead, he only staged Catalan plays, which, although commendable in every respect, necessarily limited the audience. Finally, Mr. Graner, in his favor

On the other hand, the Catalan ultra-nationalist sector, which saw Graner's company as one of the main standard-bearers for the defense of cultural Catalanism at the beginning of the century, now longed for:

"The lerrouxeries of Mr. Lerroux

Whether legend or reality, all Catalans must never forget that Lerroux was sent to Barcelona by the governments of Madrid to crush Catalan nationalism with his destructive campaigns. Those of us who are old know very well what Catalan fervor was like twenty-five years ago: it was more of a romantic sentiment than a political one. The literary renaissance, Catalan theater, the famous performances of the Espectacles Graner at the old Principal theater, the first commemorations of September 11th [the National Day of Catalonia], among other things, all of this appeared to the government in Madrid as such minor and short-lived expansions that they believed that they would fall with a puff of wind with the mere presence of the future Emperor of the Paral·lel.

And Mr. Lacandru showed up in Barcelona with airs of conqueror, according to his own words. It is clear that we believe that his conquests in Barcelona should be limited to those he made in what we now call Chinatown, but that does not stop him from stirring up the still untapped working-class spirit, prone to being swayed by anyone, whoever they may be, who has a bit of sour rhetoric, a few clichés against the bourgeoisie or the clergy[257], a lot of comedy and a lot of swagger, mainly a lot of swagger! [...]

For one reason or another, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner left an indelible imprint on Catalan culture, both for their artistic innovation and their sociocultural role. The company approached the general public to the early Modernist avant-garde through a Symbolist genre produced in a mass format, moved by an educational and pedagogical purpose. As well, they attempted to bring together and unify the authors and agents of Catalanism in a single project to revalue Catalan cultural offer in a format that was available to all audiences, whatever social class they belonged to. The socioeconomical circumstances did not allow the project to continue, but it still remained in the popular memory of Catalan people for years.

[257] These were also the main arguments used against the Espectacles-Audicions Graner by the anti-Catalan press.

Newspapers and periodicals are the informative weapon and structuring axis of Catalan nationalism, which held language as its main source of legitimacy, expressed and exercised through written publications. Writers, critics, and thinkers grouped together according to their interests and ideology in different newspapers that sought to express and disseminate their understanding of Catalan identity and their views on how the cultural genres representing the national identity should be like.

Ideological manifestos and theoretical treatises on lyric theater are scarce. Many ideas remain unrealized, meaning that there is no repertoire through which to induce the aesthetic proposal, and there are no published prologues explaining the authors' intentions... What exists, instead, is opinion and criticism in the press. Therefore, understanding the ideology of a magazine means understanding the position of the group of intellectuals behind its editorial committee, and thus piecing together the ideological puzzle of the entire community.

In order to carry out a systematic analysis of the press, it is necessary to document a corpus of reviews around a stable element with a sufficiently defined artistic and ideological proposal. This point of reference will be provided by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner as the Catalan lyrical theater project that remained most stable over time. If we analyze the newspaper archives relating to the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the ideological lines that we can identify based on the criticism they made of the genre of musical visions are:

- Artistic theater with great plastic sets
- Moral theater fit for families and children
- Musical comedy
- Literary theater based on dramatic action
- Large-format Wagnerian opera

All of them, however, show a strong emphasis on the "theatrical" element in the combination of "musical theater", leaving the role of music as secondary. The linguistic and literary elements in Catalan lyric theater will be more important than the purely musical ones. Discussions about the suitability of the lyric genre to represent the Catalan nation will be based on the use of short or long formats, dramatic versus comic tone, the inclusion of moral and religious content, and the visual design of the staging.

Analysis of these positions shows that, although various sectors of Catalan nationalism were interested in establishing a national lyrical genre, they differed among themselves on what this should be like and supported different theories and genres, often based on their political and religious views. Sometimes these differences did not prevent artistic collaboration, such as the symbiosis between comedians and "visionaries" when musical comedy was incorporated into the programming of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. In other cases, fierce and destructive criticism, which authors such as Morera and Gual lamented receiving throughout their lives, was exercised within Catalan nationalism itself.

Lyric repertoire distribution through the case study of L'alegria que passa[258]

As shown in the previous chapters, some tendencies within the Catalan lyric theater movement were taken to the stage and institutionalized as stable companies, while others were only able to organize short seasons, and some pieces were premiered as individual productions out of season. Some, like the project of a Wagnerian Catalan opera, remained as a theoretical proposal with very few pieces written, while others, like Catalan musical comedy, discretely opened their way to the stages without much theoretical reflection behind, but enjoying a popular reception.

Another aspect worth considering in this classificatory analysis is, besides the different ideological and aesthetic discourses supporting each lyric genre, the distribution models used to spread the repertoire and promote its wider representation. This chapter is dedicated to the reception of L'alegria que passa during the period of activity of the Catalan lyric theater movement (1897–1923), with the aim of documenting the span of its popularity, the geographical spread of the piece and the sociocultural impact it had on the popular imagery of Catalanism. However, the ultimate goal is to use this case study as the paradigm of Enric Morera's view on the distribution of Catalan operetta.

The composer defended that, in order to compete with the "género chico" (Castilian comic zarzuelas in one act), the Catalan lyric repertoire had to present a similar form to facilitate a replacement from within the established system[259]. Accordingly, he stated that the new national genre should also be brief in duration (one act plays) and altern sung and spoken parts, so the already-existing zarzuela companies in Catalonia could easily replace foreign Castilian titles from their repertoire with new Catalan titles without having to drastically change or readapt their functioning. Offering a similar product should motivate companies to replace their offer and should not present difficulty in maintaining [258] A preliminary version of this chapter was presented in: PÉREZ APARICIO, José Miguel (2024c): "El espacio escénico en el simbolismo lírico de Santiago Rusiñol: las representaciones en el exterior de L'alegria que passa", at the conference: Outside the Theater: Music in Unconventional Venues of Nineteenth-Century Europe. the regular audience, already used to this format of musical theater.

Morera's 1901 season of Catalan lyric theater in Barcelona could not be extended for long due to his economic limitations and the huge initial expenses dedicated to the commission of new repertoire and their corresponding new productions. However, his activist goal of creating a repertoire of Catalan operetta that existing companies could start programming was successful. The titles premiered at the Tívoli theater during this campaign reappear in different provincial and local theaters throughout the years, especially L'alegria que passa. As well, future companies programming full seasons of Catalan lyric theater in Barcelona would reprise the titles premiered by Morera in 1901, like it happened in 1903 at the Principal theater and in 1910 at the Teatre Espanyol. Even the Espectacles-Audicions Graner reprised Morera's titles between 1905 and 1907 in between its own productions.

Nevertheless, there were other projects within the Catalan lyric theater movement that did not promote or encourage this same model of repertoire distribution. While the genres of Catalan operetta and musical comedies tended to follow the aforementioned dynamics —freely performed by other companies in order for the repertoire to reach as many venues as possible—, the genre of musical visions had a very different approach on how to distribute the pieces. The genre promoted by Lluís Graner was heavily centralized within a closed network of halls dedicated exclusively to the staging of musical visions. The neuralgic center was located at the Sala Mercè in Barcelona, and following halls were opened in cities like Terrassa, Girona, Sabadell and Manresa. Most of them were led by artists that held personal friendships with Lluís Graner, were members of the same artistic associations (like the Artists' Circle of Saint Lluc), or shared the same political and religious views (close to Catholicism, traditionalism and Catalan nationalism).

These halls occasionally shared their original repertoire and even stage sets between them, but their pieces were not performed by external halls or companies, partially due to the technical requirements of the special lights design characteristic of musical visions that many unelectrified venues were not able to set. Therefore, musical visions were only performed in venues dedicated to this genre, during itineracies of these companies in external venues, or in short seasons of original musical visions programmed in other halls that temporarily adopted the genre[260]. Thus, these pieces very rarely left the network in which they had been produced and did not have reprises or new productions after the musical visions network initiated by Graner eventually collapsed by 1912.

The duality of these very different models of distribution can be clearly seen in operation when analyzing the program of the theater at the Centre de Lectura in Reus.

[260] This model of distribution will be further discussed in part II, section IV of this dissertation.

- Differentiated distribution exemplified at the Centre de Lectura in Reus

The first performances in this venue took place in 1904 by the Centre de Lectura dramatic section. The repertoire of musical theater consisted mainly in Spanish zarzuelas, for which the members of the choir Orfeó Reusenc joined the stage for the musical parts. El anillo de hierro by Zapata and Marqués and La Dolores by Tomás Bretón were some of the very first zarzuelas staged in 1904[261].

Although Morera had not able to maintain a permanent company of Catalan operetta in Barcelona, the premiered repertoire reached Reus in 1905, soon after the theater at the Centre de Lectura started holding permanent seasons. The local company from the dramatic section of the Centre de Lectura, along with the choir Orfeó Reusenc, reprised the Catalan operettas premiered in the Catalan Lyric Theater season of 1901.

Titles such as La Rosons by Mestres and Morera, Picarol by Mestres and Granados, or the whole set of collaborations between Rusiñol and Morera (L'alegria que passa, Cigales i formigues, El jardí abandonat and La nit de l'amor) were performed between 1905 and 1906, along with other Catalan dramas without music and some Spanish zarzuelas.

Although there was no external impresario backing the sponsorship of Catalan lyric theater, the simple availability of the pieces that had been written for Morera's Catalan Lyric Theater season made it possible for the local company in Reus to stage them on their own initiative.

However, once the scarce Catalan repertoire of operetta had already been staged, Castilian zarzuela continued to constitute most of the repertoire of musical theater at the Centre de Lectura for the following years. Popular titles such as Los diamantes de la corona by Camprodón and Barbieri, Los africanistas by Merino and López, Gigantes y cabezudos by Echegarai and Caballero or Bohemios by Perrín, Palacios and Vives were often performed. A trend reinforced by the frequent visits of comic-lyric companies of zarzuela that established a temporary residency at the theater, like Rafael Ceferino's and Pedro

Daina's companies that visited in 1906, Camprubí-Llorente's and Rius-Estany's companies in 1907, or Vicente Serrano's in 1908[262].

Among these visiting companies, the troupe from Graner's Mercè hall also made its way to Reus, arriving in February 1908 from Barcelona to hold a temporary residency there for the months of February and March. They programmed some of their latest and most popular musical visions —like La pastoreta, Sant Ramon, La cirereta, Mentides que no fan mal and Rialles i ploralles— between two and four days per week. Once they left, however, no local initiative gave continuation to the genre of musical visions, and it was not performed again in Reus.

From then on, the stage continued to be dominated by Castilian zarzuela. In fact, this case is a clear example of the typical situation in most provincial theaters across Catalonia. Nationalist intellectuals denounced it as the foreign invasion of the musical offer in their theaters, which had to be resolved with the promotion of Catalan pieces. In the case of Reus, when the first visiting zarzuela company arrived at the theater in January 1906, directed by Pedro Daina, it was received by a group of protesters throwing leaflets against the Spanish "género chico" during one of the performances[263].

The journal La Escena catalana clearly denounced the situation around these same dates, defending the creation of new popular repertoire that different Catalan choirs and companies could stage, supporting the distribution model used so far for Catalan operetta:

> "[...] Wherever lyrical works are advertised, regardless of the language in which they are performed, venues fill up as if it were a major event. We have seen audiences in some towns remain indifferent during the dialogues of a Castilian zarzuela, ignoring the jokes they do not understand and the flourishes of language they are unfamiliar with, eagerly awaiting the musical numbers so they can listen to them with delight. We have seen those same fans choose works for their music rather than for their plot and the situations in which they could shine. What does this indicate? That it is the music that attracts them. Well, it is up to our authors to do so.
> Currently, the repertoire of Catalan zarzuela is very scarce. There are a few old ones, which everyone has performed and with almost childlike music. Come, then, dramatic authors, with lyrical works that are easy to perform and have good music, for however intricate it may be, our choirs will perform them properly in their theaters, and thus we will see the suffocation of the > cheeky and brazen género chico, which our fans, tempted by the music, are opening their arms to from time to time, being unfaithful to the love of the things of our land[264]."

Catalan dramas were often performed in Reus among the Spanish repertoire, but the lack of a renewed repertoire of Catalan operettas, and after the musical visions companies were dissolved, there were few incentives to program lyric repertoire in Catalan language. L'alegria que passa was the only title of Catalan lyric theater that kept reappearing on the program. The piece was performed in 1905, 1907, 1908, 1914, mostly in between other titles of Spanish zarzuela. In 1917, Joaquim Viñas installed his Catalan company in Reus between February and March, reprising L'alegria que passa and La reina del cor by Iglésias and Morera, as well as the musical comedy Permeti'm! by Puiggarí and Esquerrà, premiered at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, and the Catalan zarzuela Els carboners by Aulés and Pérez-Cabrero, also reprised by Graner at the Principal theater. Viñas came back between October 1921 and January 1922, bringing back the title of L'alegria que passa among his repertoire of Catalan dramas[265].

Hence, we can see that both of the main genres that constituted the Catalan national lyric movement were received at the Centre de Lectura in Reus, following the two different strategies of distribution described above. The repertoire of Catalan operetta was adopted by the local company from Reus on their own initiative, with a wider flexibility to program and reprise it throughout time, while the musical visions were received only when the company from one of the venues within Graner's network was able to visit on a temporary residency, bringing some of the pieces from their repertoire.

Therefore, while the dissemination of musical visions can be easily studied through the identification of the halls and companies dedicated to the genre, the repertoire of Catalan operetta presents wider difficulties, since there was no official sponsorship to trace and any company could freely take the text and scores to perform the pieces by their own will. In this context, L'alegria que passa becomes a referential paradigm as the first great commercial success of the Catalan lyric movement that remained on the stage throughout the whole period of activity of the movement.

❖ Long-lasting presence on the stages of Barcelona

As explained in previous chapters, L'alegria que passa started to be written in 1897 and was commercially premiered by the Teatre Íntim company led by Adrià Gual in 1899. Precisely for being one of the very first pieces that inaugurates the Catalan lyric theater movement, L'alegria que passa is the most appropriate case study to use in terms of evaluating the dissemination and planned distribution of the repertoire.

While other initial titles like the opera La fada or the dramatized folk song Blancaflor were not reprised in commercial productions after their premieres, L'alegria que passa did so, and several times, maintaining an almost-permanent presence of this title on the Catalan theater billboards. The social impact that the piece had on the popular imagery of Catalanism, and the artistic influence it had on the further development and spreading of the Catalan operetta movement make it a paradigmatic example of the impact and distribution of the genre that Morera called "Catalan operetta".

Soon after its public premiere in Barcelona, it started to attract the attention of companies that were interested in staging it, since the text with the musical fragments had been already published in 1898. While Morera was preparing the commercial debut of the piece in his Teatre Líric Català season, that eventually took place during the winter of 1901, he had to intervene to stop a new production in Reus that the society La Palma was planning to stage on May 1900[266]. On the meantime, a translation of the piece into Spanish language was staged at the Teatre Espanyol of Barcelona and at the Teatro de la Comedia in Madrid with Adrià Gual's company during the year 1900, as well as in Valencia by the company led by Cuevas[267].

Eventually, on January 12th, 1901, Morera premiered the commercial production of L'alegria que passa, in the original Catalan version, as the main piece of his Catalan Lyric Theater season. It was performed more than 60 times in the three months that the season lasted at the Tívoli theater. At the same time, the Italian Vitaliani company that was temporarily installed in Barcelona also performed their version of L'alegria que passa translated into Italian[268]. Since then, the title remained on the billboards of the theaters of the capital city almost permanently for the following two decades.

Due to the massive popularity that it gained, and to the fact that such a brief piece was very easy to schedule in varied programs along with other longer dramas or comedies, L'alegria que passa remained in the repertoire of the main companies installed in the theaters across Barcelona. Following its performances, the title can be found practically in every season in one or another theater in the city. After its premiere at the Tívoli theater, the following season it was seen at the Romea theater, in March 1902. The brief reprise of the Catalan Lyric Theater project in 1903 also brought the piece to the Principal theater, and it was seen again there once Lluís Graner installed his Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the same venue between 1905 and 1908.

During those same years, also the Romea theater scheduled L'alegria que passa in January 1907, in the occasion of the premiere of a new title written by Morera, El mestre [The teacher], for which the theater had to temporarily hire an orchestra. The Romea company also included L'alegria que passa during their 1907 summer season, performing it in Barcelona as well as in Figueres and Manresa, and reprising it again at the Romea theater in December 1907.

After the dismantling of Graner's project, Morera directed a new reprise of the Catalan Lyric Theater project in 1910, scheduling L'alegria que passa in February at the Teatre Espanyol and again at the Granvia theater where the company moved once the initial lyric season was over. In April, the company travelled to Sabadell, where they maintained the piece in their active repertoire, and in June, the Vitaliani company visited again Barcelona, bringing back their version of L'alegria que passa.

The reformed Catalan company that remained at the Principal theater after Graner's project was over also started off their first new season with L'alegria que passa, programing it in September 1910. Soon after, the Romea theater also scheduled it during November, and reprised it again at the end of the season in April 1911.

The summer of 1912, it was staged at the Novetats theater in Italian by the actor Alfred Sainati. It was seen there again in September, performed in Catalan this time, during an extraordinary performance organized by the journal El teatre català as a fundraiser, directed by Enric Giménez and with stage set lent by painter Ros i Güell. The following year, it was the Teatro Nuevo the one that hosted L'alegria que passa in October 1913, and in November 1914, it was reprised again at the Principal theater under the musical conductor Francesc de P. Bové and the choir Orfeó Vilafranquí.

The piece even reached the stage of the opera theater, the Gran Teatre del Liceu. In March 1915, the actress misses Xatart organized an especial event in which she performed L'alegria que passa, along with La paralela, La sobrina del cura and other comic titles that, according to the press, extended the session until 2:30 at night[269]. That same year, it was seen again at the Círcol theater in the neighborhood of Sants during the month of October, where it was reprised again a year later, in October 1916.

The Victòria theater also hosted L'alegria que passa in March 1917, and in October of that same year, it was also performed at the Gran Teatre del Bosc in the neighborhood of Gràcia in a special session commemorating 50 years of Catalan theater. Later on, it was staged at the Goya theater in March 1918, and another performance was scheduled in April 1919 in a "patriotic session" organized by the journal L'intransigent at the Olimpo theater[270].

Reached this point, it can be securely affirmed that, since its first public performance by Adrià Gual's company at the Teatre Líric of Barcelona in 1899, L'alegria que passa was performed uninterruptedly for at least 20 years between the main professional theaters of the Catalan capital. Afterwards, the Romea theater reprised it again in 1921 and in 1925, announcing it on their program as "the jewel of Catalan Lyric Theater"[271]. Even in the 1930s we can still find the title of L'alegria que passa in some of the main theaters, like in June 1931 at the Novetats theater.

However, not only the professional companies and the large theatrical venues showed interest in programming L'alegria que passa. The piece was also found very attractive by companies acting in smaller halls and by amateur groups, whose several performances can be documented all across Barcelona, parallel to the professional productions in the large theaters.

Several recreational societies and amateur dramatic groups staged L'alegria que passa throughout the years. We can highlight the performances at the Cercle de Propietaris de Gràcia in April 1904 and October 1907, at the Centre Recreatiu Esquerra del Ensanxe during February and March 1908, at the Ateneu de Sant Gervasi in September 1909, or even at the private establishment known as L'Asiàtic in November 1912. Or those organized by the Escola Coral Catalana [Catalan Choral School] in November 1906, La Sardana society in December 1907, or the Floràlia dramatic section of the Aplec del Tercer Districte led by Mr. Rissech, along the Grieg quintet conducted by Mr. Font, in October 1909[272]. This last one also included in the program Permeti'm!, a musical comedy premiered at the Principal theater under the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

It was also a popular piece to stage during the "festa major" or the neighborhood festivities. This was the case in Sant Andreu in December 1914, when it was performed at the Centre Popular of this district by its dramatic section, along La nit de l'amor (written by the same authors), while the orchestra and choir were conducted by Ll. Carbonell[273]. It was performed as well for the festivities of Sant Gervasi in September 1915 by La Filharmònica dramatic society, led by Francesc Guasch, and a choir conducted by Mr. Jordà, with a stage set designed by Mr. Sorribas[274].

As well, the piece was performed by societies and centers of diverse and opposed political and religious inclinations, which is of special interest as a proof of the wide scope of sociocultural interest that the piece aroused among Catalan society. L'alegria que passa was performed by the dramatic sections of nationalist organization, like the Centre Autonomista Català of Sant Gervasi, which staged it in March 1910, and the Centre Nacionalista Republicà of Gràcia, in April 1908. As well, Catholic and Traditionalist entities hosted this title, like the Joventut Tradicionalista of Sarrià did in January 1911, and the Acadèmia de la Joventut Catòlica in February 1918.

Workers' societies with leftist political views also performed L'alegria que passa. Such was the case of La Internacional society in November 1908 (playing it along L'himne d'en Riego[275], which later on would become the anthem of the II Spanish Republic), the Institut Obrer Gracienc in December 1908, El Artesano workers' society in March 1918, and the Círcol Barcelonès d'Obrers of Sant Josep in October 1919.

This large range of documented performances proofs that L'alegria que passa reached a wide social scope that transcended political and ideological affiliations. It was performed by professional companies and amateur dramatic sections, as well as by nationalist, traditionalist, Catholic and socialist organization, arousing a genuine interest in all of them independently. As well, it remained of public interest during at least two decades after its premiere. Not only the professional theaters programmed it in every season from 1899 to 1919 but it was also constantly present in smaller halls and recreational centers.

❖ Mapping its performances across Catalonia…

Despite some scholars having circumscribed the Catalan lyric theater movement within the borders of the capital city[276], several amateur groups and dramatic sections of cultural centers across the region often performed lyric pieces in Catalan language, some imported from the repertoire of the professional comic companies, while many others were original titles. L'alegria que passa was one of these titles that crossed all kinds of geographical borders. Even if being "the jewel of the Catalan Lyric Theater" movement in the capital (as the Romea theater advertised it once), its popular success did not take place exclusively in the city of Barcelona and it was also widely performed across Catalonia.

In some cases, they were travelling productions performed by itinerant companies based in Barcelona. For example, the Catalan operetta company that Enric Morera formed for his 1901 Catalan Lyric Theater season travelled to Sitges in August of that same year to perform the piece at El Prado, along with Picarol and La Rosons[277]. The production that took place at the Centro Fraternal in Palafrugell in April 1902 by the company led by Miss Blanca also included many actors from the original premiere in Barcelona, like Joaquim Viñas as the clown[278].

The future reprises of Morera's Catalan Lyric Theater project also itinerated to other cities in Catalonia, bringing L'alegria que passa with them. After hosting a short season in Barcelona, the lyric company travelled in October 1903 to the Euterpe theater in Mataró, scheduling also La Rosons, La barca and Picarol[279]. Following the same dynamics, after a short season at the Teatre Espanyol of Barcelona, in April 1910 the company visited the Euterpe theater in Sabadell, led again by Joaquim Viñas with Maria Morera, and including in the program other lyric titles such as La santa espina, La reina del cor, La reina vella and Les roselles[280].

As well, the company from the Romea theater also included L'alegria que passa among the titles of their repertoire. In June 1903, the Alcácer-Gil duo of impresarios brough the Romea company led by Enric Borràs to the Teatro Circo in Reus, performing Els vells [The elderly], El pati blau [The blue yard] and L'alegria que passa[281]. When the Romea company performed in July 1907 at the Principal theater of Figueres, now led by actors Capdevila and Goula, L'alegria que passa was still present between the titles of the repertoire that they performed in this city[282].

In October 1911, the Artística Companyia Dramàtica Catalana visited Banyoles, led by Joan Santacana (who in 1914 would lead the company at the Principal theater) and made up of actors from Barcelona, mainly coming from the Romea theater company. They included L'alegria que passa in the program they performed at the theater of the Centre Banyolense[283]. In February 1912, Assumpció Paricio —who premiered the role of Zaira in 1901 and was the lead lyric actress at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner— embodied this character again for the performance given to commemorate the reopening of the Centre Català in Girona, along with colleagues from the Principal theater such as Artur Balot. They also scheduled the musical comedy Permeti'm! in the program[284], originally premiered at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

However, these were the exceptions, and most of the performances of L'alegria que passa outside of the Catalan capital were local initiatives performed by provincial companies or amateur groups. Besides the multiple productions that took place in the city of Barcelona, performances of L'alegria que passa have been documented in at least 50 different municipalities across Catalonia. These range from the very northern areas close to the French border, like Puigderà or Camprodon, to the southern province of Tarragona, as well as from coastal towns —like Sitges, Vilanova i la Geltrú, Badalona, Mataró and Palamós— to the western interior region of Lleida.

The Catalan capitals of all four provinces witnessed performances of L'alegria que passa. From what has been possible to document, at least 2 took place in Tarragona, 2 in Lleida, 5 in Girona, and almost 30 in Barcelona. Other relevant provincial cities also staged L'alegria que passa: 4 times in Figueres, 5 times in Reus, and 3 times in Vic. However, it was not only an urban phenomenon. Performances were scattered across the Catalan map, including also the smallest towns. For example, in March 1915, the same month that L'alegria que passa was performed at the Gran Teatre del Liceu, the Catalan opera house in the capital of Barcelona (which was close to reach 590.000 residents), the youth section of the Esbart Nacionalista of Torelló also performed this piece in a town that counted at the time with around 4.000 inhabitants. The piece was also played in Caldes de Montbui, with around 3.600 residents; Santa Coloma de Queralt, with not much more than 3.000; Artés, with around 2.3000; and Centelles, barely surpassing 2.000[285].

If all the locations are listed out, those would be: Barcelona city, L'Hospitalet de Llobregat, Sant Feliu de Llobregat, Molins de Rei, Sant Cugat del Vallès, Rubí, Sabadell, Terrassa, Montcada, Badalona, Vilassar de dalt, Mataró, Granollers, Caldes de Montbui, Llinars del Vallès, Centelles, Vic, Roda de Ter, Torelló, Artés, Manresa, Igualada, Sant Sadurní d'Anoia, Vilafranca del Penedés, Sant Pere de Ribas, Vilanova i la Geltrú and Sitges in the province of Barcelona; Tarragona city, Reus, El Vendrell, Valls, Montblanc, Poblet and Santa Coloma de Queralt in the province of Tarragona; only Lleida city and Tàrrega in the province of Lleida; and Girona city, La Bisbal, Palafrugell, Palamós, Sant

Among these performances, it's worth highlighting the one in July 1905 at the Apolo theater of Vilanova i la Geltrú, performed along La nit de l'amor, with music played by the Orfeó Vilanovés, a choir of boys and girls, and an orchestra conducted by Mr. Montserrat. In December 1907, it was played at the Casino Circo of El Vendrell by the association La Lira, with Pau Gomís as conductor and the collaboration of a choir of boys.

In February 1910, Ramon Segalés and Lluïsa Fernández directed the piece at the Cervantes theater of Sant Cugat del Vallès. The following year, 1911, it was played in Llinars, and Rusiñol attended the performance accompanied by his family. In February 1915, the group Foc Nou staged it at the Carmen theater of Palamós, in collaboration with the orchestra of the Federal Center.

Later on, in March 1922, the theater of the Círcol Instructiu i Recreatiu in Caldes de Montbui also performed L'alegria que passa, in a program that included La viola d'or and La nit de l'amor as well. The season was dedicated to Catalan lyric theater, including titles such as La santa espina and Joan de l'Ós, premiered at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, and the music was conducted by Joan Valls.

Although it can't be fully assured that every regional performance of L'alegria que passa has been identified, a complete list of the documented performances outside of the capital city of Barcelona is given, which at least represent a good sample to realize the geographical and chronological scope that this piece reached[286]:

❖ … and outside of Catalonia

Despite the success of the piece in Catalonia, one of the very first professional performances apparently took place in Madrid. In February 1900, the press announces that López del Castillo is planning to produce the Spanish translation of L'alegria que passa at the Teatro de la Comedia, as well as the drama Silenci [Silence] by Adrià Gual, also translated into Spanish[287]. Those performances would have taken place in mid-May by the Teatre Íntim company directed by Gual, which were announced including also the titles Ghosts by Ibsen and Teresa by Clarín in the program[288].

On April 7th, 1901, during his stay in Valencia, Rusiñol improvised a private reading of L'alegria que passa during a visit to the Fine Arts Circle. Misses Dolores Sala, who casually was present at the moment, played the musical parts of the piece[289]. The following month, the piece was brought to the stage by a professional troupe. On May 18th, 1901, L'alegria que passa was premiered in Valencia at the Ruzafa theater by Agapito Cuevas's company, apparently using the Spanish translation[290].

The Principal theater of Mallorca also hosted L'alegria que passa on March 22nd, 1902, performed by Blanca Iggnius's visiting company. The local press from Mallorca highly expected the premiere, dedicating whole pages of their journals to explaining the plot of the piece and even transcribe the dialogues of some selected scenes[291]. Apparently Rusiñol travelled to Mallorca to watch this production[292]. After Iggnius's season, a Castilian zarzuela company was installed at the Principal theater, while a Valencian zarzuela company arrived at the Líric theater of Mallorca.

However, one of the most remarkable productions of L'alegria que passa outside of Catalonia took place in June 1904, when impresario Tirso Escudero finally managed to bring Enric Borràs and his company to Madrid after spending a year after him trying to make the actor sign the contract[293]. Given his renown, it was a highly expected event in Madrid, as well as for the Catalan press, since the visit of the resident company of the Romea theater (considered the house of Catalan dramatic arts) to Madrid was felt with national pride.

Some of the pieces that Borràs brought to the Teatro de la Comedia were Terra baixa [Lowlands], by Àngel Guimerà, considered as a beautifully delicate drama, and the comedy Don Gonzalo o l'orgull del gec, by Albert Llanas, which the local press from Madrid did not like. Els vells, by Ignasi Iglésias, and El místic [The mystic], by Rusiñol, were profusely applauded, while L'alegria que passa was considered by the press as "acceptable[294]". As for the crew of actors that made up the company, besides Enric Borràs himself, great names of the Catalan scene were present, such as Maria Morera, Emília Baró and Joaquim Viñas. The only piece of the repertoire that included music was L'alegria que passa, for which an orchestra was present, conducted by renowned Amadeu Vives. The fact that one of the most praised Catalan composers of zarzuela was present to conduct Morera's score indicates the relevance given to the musical numbers.

Rusiñol's fans from Mallorca had been closely following the visit of Borràs's company to Madrid[295]. Before it was finished, they had already announced their intentions to bring it to Mallorca during the summer season, right after their visit to Madrid, before they returned to their residence at the Romea theater in Barcelona. It was planned to be a cultural highlight, including the visit of authors such as Rusiñol and Iglésias, which were travelling along with the company, to attend the performances[296].

The company gave its first performance at the Principal theater of Mallorca on July 2nd, out of a total of ten performances. However, there was a special interest in Mallorca that Enric Morera would attend to conduct himself the music of L'alegria que passa; if his calendar didn't allow so, then a top-level conductor such as Vives (who was already familiar with the score) would come to conduct it[297]. Again, a strong interest in the musical part of the piece was shown, noting that it was an indivisible part of the lyric play, equally praised as the text.

In January 1906, L'alegria que passa was staged again in Madrid at the Eslava theater, this time following a new Spanish translation done by Vital Aza[298]. The first performance took place on January 19th, played by the company directed by actress Loreto Prado and actor Enrique Chicote, and the stage set was designed by scenographer Martínez Garí[299].

Santiago Rusiñol directed himself the rehearsals, due to the admiration he professed to Prado since he watched her playing his piece El místic, who played the clown role. Matilde Franco embodied Zaira for this production[300]. Despite the mediatic expectation that surrounded the premiere, the Castilian and conservative press did not receive too well Rusiñol's symbolist proposal.

The bias of right-winged journals like ABC is evident: "These Catalans, but not the Catalanists [Catalan nationalists], because Rusiñol is not one of them, fortunately, are terrible! The joy that passes by…! And why does it have to pass by?[301]". Others like El Liberal or La correspondencia militar found the piece of an exasperating monotony, lacking vigor, and recommended Rusiñol to stick to the comedy genre, proof that they didn't appreciate nor understand the decant dramaturgy developed by the author and the symbolic connotations of this intentioned monotony, although they liked Morera's musical numbers. Others, like La época, praised the delicate details of the piece and the musical impressions caused by the music that closely reinforces the emotional suggestion of the scene, as well as the sounds effects included, like the irregular hammering of the workers while singing their working song. They recognize, though, that the piece "would have been even more [praised] somewhere where it didn't have to compete with the triumphant tangos and the cancan-like couplets[302]".

Besides the translations into Spanish and into Italian mentioned so far, the news about French and German translations also reached the Catalan news. The journal Mercure de France published a French translation by Marius Andrée in 1899[303], the same year in which the play had been premiered in Barcelona. Later on, in 1906, during the Espectacles-Audicions Graner period, in which the Catalan lyric theater project was strongly revived and Enric Morera reached his peak of popularity, it is announced on the press that he had been contacted by a company from Italy to stage his opera Bruniselda, as well as Santiago Rusiñol had received a letter asking for authorization to translate L'alegria que passa into German[304], although no later confirmation of this translation has been found.

- American productions

Performances of L'alegria que passa have been documented abroad, but not in foreign languages. The piece was actually played multiple times in Latin America by Catalan associations of émigrés in the continent, which used the original Catalan version to promote the use of their native language, even if surrounded by a Spanish-speaking environment.

The American city that hosted more performances of L'alegria que passa was Buenos Aires, in Argentina. The Casal Català founded in 1906[305] started from the very beginning of its activity to promote Catalan theater, both with a local amateur section and by bringing visiting professional companies from Catalonia. The company led by Jaume Capdevila visited Buenos Aires for the first time in 1908, coming back in the following years. In 1909, they included L'alegria que passa in the program they played at the San Martín theater, and in 1910 Santiago Rusiñol along with the actor Borràs visited the city personally. They were received with a special performance of other Rusiñol's dramatic titles by the local company from the Casal Català[306].

In November 1911, the piece was staged again by the Casal Català troupe in a performance dedicated to actors Josep Vall and Manel Biosca along the comedy Aucells de pas and the drama Llavor redemptora, including a choir section especially for L'alegria que passa[307]. In September 1913, the president of the Casal Català, J. Riera i Puntí, claims on the press that his organization had been the first one to perform in Buenos Aires L'alegria que passa in the open-air, which was becoming a trend among the Catalan centers in Latin America[308].

Again in 1917, the Catalan Theater season organized by the visiting company led by Joan Vehil included L'alegria que passa among other Catalan dramas and comedies, and even some translations of European pieces that had been popular on the Catalan stages in the recent years, from Classics like Beaumarchais to contemporary Ibsen and Hauptmann[309]. It's worth noting that it was the only musical piece in their dramatic repertoire, but the musical part of this piece was not overlooked.

In the following years, the musical numbers of L'alegria que passa were played in concert: once in August 2nd 1919 by the sextet of the Casal Català, along with the song Els segadors (also by Morera) and a symphony made of Catalan folk motifs by Rivera as the first celebration in Argentina of the Catalan national festivity[310], and again in 1919 by the same sextet in an event at the Casal Català dedicated to nationalist congressman Pi i Suñer, along with L'Euterpense by Manent, Aires espanyols by Granados, and the sardana Garí by Bretón[311].

Another performance in Argentina is worth noting, but this case it took place in the city of Mendoza. The Centre Català located in this city informed in December 1917 about the organization of an "aplec catalanista" or nationalist Catalan gathering that would be celebrated in Medoza's park (currently known as San Martín park), in which L'alegria que passa was announced as the central piece to be played by the Catalan choir and dramatic section of the center.

Besides the multiple performances in Argentina, other countries in the continent also hosted L'alegria que passa. On January 1st, 1912, the Orfeó Català of La Habana, Cuba, conducted by Joan Gay (author of the music for El jardí abandonat, another of the symbolist lyric dramas written by Rusiñol), organized a cultural event to celebrate the New Year, in which L'alegria que passa was played. Actors came from the declamation section of the Catalan Colony, and the performance took place at La Tropical gardens[312].

Also in January 1912, L'alegria que passa was performed in Santiago de Chile. The event was organized as a "Catalan brotherhood celebration" by Joan Torrendell, dramaturg from Mallorca and director of the journal El correo de Cataluña, edited in Montevideo[313]. Later on, in May 1917, the recently founded Centre Català in Asunción, Paraguay, also manifested their intention of staging L'alegria que passa among their new artistic program for the season, including exhibitions and concerts as well[314].

These performances have been traced through the press in Catalan language edited in America and stored in Catalan archives, as well as in the Catalan journals that held correspondents in the continent. However, further systematical research in foreign local press, like the local press in America or the case of France to check whether the French translation was performed there, has not been carried out. Potentially, a further international reception could be documented, especially among the prolific activity of the Catalan associations in America.

Nevertheless, even if we could only interpretate the documented performances as a sample, the large number of performances that have been traced already denotes the extremely successful reception this piece. In total, 31 different productions are documented within the capital city of Barcelona and 78 more productions across the rest of Catalonia, between 50 different municipalities. Outside of Catalonia, it was performed at least 3 times in Madrid, 2 in Mallorca and 1 in Valencia, as well as across the sea in the American continent. At least 4 performances are documented in Buenos Aires (plus 2 more times in concert) and 1 in Mendoza, La Habana, Santiago and Asunción. In total, 125 productions of L'alegria que passa have been documented during the span of the Catalan lyric theater movement between 1897 and 1922.

❖ Open-air performances

Among all the different productions of L'alegria que passa, there's one type that is worth highlighting for its added performative value. These are the open-air performances taking place in the town squares of multiple villages, which closely resemble the place where the play takes place as described and painted by Rusiñol.

There is no doubt that Rusiñol pictured his own trips with Ramon Casas across the rural areas of Catalonia[315] when he wrote L'alegria que passa. The one-act piece is rather an imagined scene in one of those villages that Rusiñol had visited so often, poetically used to describe his own experiences and feelings about the modernization of art in Catalonia.

The stage directions written by Rusiñol at the beginning of the piece describe that:

> "the scene takes place in an indifferent, vulgar, and boring village. In the background, going across the stage, there is a dusty road and two or three wheel chocks. Around it, there are shops. A wheelwright with a wheel at the foot of the portal, burning shavings nearby; a carpenter with a coffin […]
> In the foreground, a small square. On the left, a church without style or architectural order, with three steps at the entrance, and a little chapel with a extinguished lantern. On the right, a blacksmith's shop with horseshoes on the door. In the middle of the square, half a dozen plane trees, dusty and sick, and two crooked stone benches. […][316]"

The poster for the piece was also painted by Rusiñol himself, providing a pictorial view of how the author imagined the stage set. It is painted as if the viewer was located in the middle of the mentioned road leading to town. Plane trees are planted on both sides of the road, and the circus cart is heading to town, which can be seen further away on the background. The character of the clown appears on first term in front of the viewer.

[315] Rusiñol wrote a series of articles between 1899 and 1892 for La Vanguardia describing his experiences when travelling by cart across the northern rural areas of Catalonia.
[316] RUSIÑOL, Santiago (1898): L'alegria que passa. Barcelona: L'Avenç, p. 5.

During the studied decades, multiple performances of L'alegria que passa took place in the open-air, in villages that closely resembled the description provided by Rusiñol. The performative space here acquires a full new dimension of meaning, because the local audience and the town itself become active elements of the play, involving them in the fictional reality, or rather converting fiction into part of their reality. The villagers that receive the circus cart and that attend their performance are not imaginary anymore, it's the audience. The main square with a dull church, stores and trees is not a backdrop anymore, they are real elements of the performative space where they play is being staged.

These performances are not like any other in which a stage is placed in a public space to represent from there the fictional reality, like the "theater of nature" performances, for instance. The village as location does not signify here a mere contextual change from one place to another. It conceptually differ very much, since there is no recreation of a fictional space. In the cases in which L'alegria que passa is performed in the square of villages like the one described by Rusiñol, the play is being performed in what Erika

Ficher-Lichte named the "original location". This phenomenon became a trend impulse by theater reformist from the avantgardes and took place between the 1910s and 1930s, promoted by directors like Reinhart, Hofmannsthal and Evreinov. Their intention was to perform the plays in locations that held a thematic relation with the content of the play[317]. This is the case of L'alegria que passa, a play that presents the arrival of a circus company in a cart that stops in the main square, when it is played in the square of a real village.

As the reviews for the performance at the Plazuela del Carmen of Camprodon in August 1906 said:

> "The atmosphere, the decoration, the ambience and location of the Plazuela del Carmen, as if Rusiñol had dreamed it up, could not have been more fitting. […] It begins [...] presenting the sad and melancholic aspect of the square of a town without life, without aspirations, dull and without highs or lows. Things couldn't be more accurate. […]
> The climax of the play arrives: the exit of the acrobats' cart, producing a magical effect. [...] The play continues in this way until the end, when all those who have taken part in it have left. [...] The cart produced the true effect of reality.[318]."

Moreover, the limits of the play were diluted into the events surrounding the performance. The arrival of the actual cart used for the play in town was also announced in some cases as a local event, for which neighbors gathered. The feeling created by their arrival, bringing joy and culture as a novelty to town for two or three days of performances before leaving again, was identical as the feeling depicted by the play.

Open-air performances taking place at the square of rural villages can be documented, for instance, at the Plazuela del Carmen of Camprodon in 1906, at the square of Sant Feliu de Pallerols in 1909 and 1912, at the Plaça dels Porcs of Ripoll in 1912 and at the square of Sant Hilari Sacalm also in 1912.

An especially remarkable one took place at the main promenade of Centelles in 1921. Announced as a "completely natural performance", the location closely resembles the road from the poster designed by Rusiñol. The poser also announced the attendance of the author to the performance.

Other performances did not take place in such symbolic places but were also staged outdoors. For instance, in July 1905, the Prado Suburense theater in Sitges installed a stage in its garden, most likely due to the summer temperatures. On the eve of Saint James Day, a special event was held, gathering an orchestra made of 30 professional musicians to perform the lyric dramas L'alegria que passa and La nit de l'amor, both by Rusiñol and Morera[319].

In July 1916, the Ateneu Autonomista from District III of Barcelona organized a charity event at the Güell park. The performance started with musical numbers, sports exhibitions, choir singing and boxing competitions. To wrap up the day, L'alegria que passa was performed under the artistic direction of scenographer Ros i Güell and stage direction by Josep Santpere. The piece was played at the Greek theater of the park, with views to the city of Barcelona from above and the sea as the background. However, some inconveniences did not allow for the best enjoyment of the performance: it was already getting dark by the time it started due to organizational delays, too many people gathered for the dimensions of the place and the piano was not audible for everyone[320].

Besides these open-air performances across Catalonia, L'alegria que passa also became the inaugural piece for the implementation of the "teatre de la natura" project at the Catalan colonies in America. The initiative started in Catalan lands in 1910 with the premiere in Figueres of the lyric tragedy Canigó, with a libretto arranged by Josep Carner and music by Jaume Pahissa, and it was followed by other lyric titles, such as Flors de cingle [Flowers of a rocky mass] in 1911 or La viola d'or [The golden viola] in 1914, that were staged in the forest of La Garriga.

Soon after the first performances took place in the motherland, the Catalan émigrés decided to also bring the initiative of performing theatrical pieces in the middle of nature as part of the cultural programs of the Catalan associations abroad. The piece that was generally chosen to initiate the project was L'alegria que passa. It was widely recognized as a symbol of Catalan dramatic culture, its authors had developed successful careers since then, and its staging was accessible enough for the amateur companies that formed the Catalan artistic troupes in America.

The first of these performances took place in La Habana, Cuba, in January 1912. The Cuban Orfeó Català scheduled the piece for the New Year's celebration that was being organized for the Catalan community on January 1st.

> "There is great excitement among the entire Catalan Colony on the occasion of the festival initiated by the Orfeó Català, with the enthusiastic cooperation of all the other Catalan societies that exist here.
> The upcoming New Year's festival will take place on January 1st in the magnificent gardens of La Tropical, which have been made available in their entirety for the event in question.

> We have repeatedly reported on the successes and achievements of the Orfeó Català, which now, under the expert direction of its maestro, the distinguished and well-known composer Mr. Joan Gay, is rehearsing remarkable songs that are sure to bring this organization a new and well-deserved triumph. […]
> The Declamation Section, chaired by the well-known Rafalitus, is already rehearsing the celebrated lyrical comedy, originally by Santiago Rusiñol and Enrique Morera, L'alegria que passa, in which the acclaimed actor Mr. Escribà and others will take part and direct the final rehearsals. This play will be performed outdoors, thus initiating the poetic and beautiful spectacle of "theater of nature" in Cuba.
> Sardanas played by cobla and other popular dances will also be featured at the festival, and undoubtedly all Catalans and a good number of supporters of such a grand and comprehensive festival will gather fraternally in the spacious gardens of La Tropical, which we sincerely applaud and associate ourselves with[321]."

Around the same dates, L'alegria que passa was also staged in the open-air in Santiago de Chile. In January 1912, the piece was performed in the forest as part of a Catalan brotherhood event promoted by Balearic dramaturg Joan Torrendell and, according to the Catalan press correspondant, attended by thousands of people:

> "At around five o'clock, on a stage set up in the middle of the forest, Catalan amateurs performed Rusiñol and Morera's beautiful production, L'alegria que passa.
> More than a thousand people gathered on the flat ground that served as the audience area to watch and applaud the climax scenes of this beautiful comedy, which was well performed and competently directed.
> We celebrate it for what it represents for our national theater[322]."

Some of the previously mentioned performances in America, like the one organized by the Casal Català of Buenos Aires in September 1913, and the one programmed by the Centre Català of Mendoza at the San Martín park in December 1917, can also be contextualized within the "theater of nature" project. The performance advertised in May 1917 in Asunción, organized by the Centre Català, was also announced as "the inauguration of the theater of nature" in Paraguay[323].

❖ Impact on the popular imagery

The multiple and diverse stagings of L'alegria que passa proof the sociocultural interest on the piece, from professional and amateur performers to include it in their repertoire, as well as from the public to continue attending the its performances. However, the social impact of L'alegria que passa went beyond the limits of the stage, becoming a reference in the popular imagery of Catalonia.

Many people recognized their own localities and villages in the grey town where the piece takes place, echoing Rusiñol's criticism towards the lack of cultural reception and renewal:

> "Once again Sant Feliu has proved that it lives in an ambience of boredom when faced with our Catalan art. Nothing has been awakened by the glorious name of our master Àngel Guimerà. Not even a slight desire to be delighted by the real scenes, full of life from Sainet trist. Who doesn't remember that grey town from L'alegria que passa when they look at ours, with this stillness, this boredom of someone whose artistic taste is dead. Oh, Sant Feliu![324]"

> "The artist [Maria Barrientos] has passed by Valls like in L'alegria que passa, without leaving a print in the heart of Vall's neighbors. An eminent artist has passed by, maybe the best voice in the world, but not a compatriot. Was this the thinking of the festivity organizers?[325]"

> "Events like these, healthy celebrations for the soul and for the body, is what our town [Lleida] needs, which extol and dignify it, that take it away from, as Rusiñol said in L'alegria que passa, the «eternal prose» it is condemned to […][326]"

The political situation in many towns resembled the situation denounced by Rusiñol in L'alegria que passa through the character of the mayor.

> "In L'alegria que passa, the mayor, a man missing ideas and not familiar with spiritual joy, dedicated to the selfish life of a materialist person, find his son reading a book and challenges him by saying: —«Read the letter from the duros coins, they all say the same but they please the sight.»
> Our regionalist congressmen, resembling the mayor from L'alegria que passa, do not conceive that the citizens of a town can have ideals and feel spiritual joy, the joy that a select man feels when preaching and fighting at all times for the implantation of the doctrine[327]."
> "We all know that Mr. Cusí, like that guy from L'alegria que passa, only finds his sight pleased in politics when he reads the letters from the duros coins[328]."

Some politicians also imitated the tone of cheerful characters like the clown when giving public speeches, especially in festive occasions like the local "festa major" or major festivity:

> "We have received the program of the major festivity that today, tomorrow and the two consecutive days will be celebrated in the town of Sant Feliu de Pallerols. The activities are very > varied and the preface is written with a lot of grace, imitating the speech of the clown from L'alegria que passa. We're thankful for the attention[329]."

> "And the councilor Andreu, making a parody of Cop-de-puny from L'alegria que passa, said that we can't allow that anyone doubts of the integrity of a public worker[330]."

The piece also inspired some cartoons on the press. L'Esquella de la Torratxa made a parody of Catalan politicians as the circus troupe from L'alegria que passa on their cart to mock the Catalan Lyric Theater season programmed in 1903. They were, on one hand, announcing the arrival of Catalanists to the Tívoli theater, and, on the other, foreseeing the brevity of their projected season as "a joy that passes by", as the title of the piece claims.

As well, in March 1905, they used the reference of L'alegria que passa again to make a parody of Rusiñol and his colleague Ramon Casas, who were embarking on a trip to Castilian Spain. Rusiñol is pictured as Don Quixote following the Quixote route, which marks all the places mentioned in the novel.

Lastly, it is worth mentioning other dramatic pieces that were inspired by L'alegria que passa. In 1904, the comedy El amor que pasa [The love that passes by] was published in Spanish by the Quintero brothers, renowned librettist of Castilian zarzuela. The piece echoed in multiple occasions that they did not only have in common a similar title, but also their content. The journal El Guadalete, from Jerez de la Frontera (Andalucía), dedicated a whole column of the front page to speak about this new piece and its similarities with L'alegria que passa, proving that the piece was also known outside of Catalonia:

> "[…] in my understanding, the new piece by the Quintero brothers shares more than just an analogy on the title with L'alegria que passa by Rusiñol. And I'm not saying that to censor it, just as an ingenuous observation. There is something common to both pieces, a certain mysterious poetry that Spanish slept towns by the foot of the mountain or laying by a railroad station exhale[331]."

As well, Rusiñol published in 1907 in collaboration with Gregorio Martínez Sierra what the press called "an enlargement of L'alegria que passa" as a comedy in 3 acts[332]. It was premiered at the Teatro de la Comedia in Madrid with actress Rosario Pino as one of the highlighted performers. The following year, Martínez Sierra also translated Cigales i formigues by Rusiñol to stage it in Madrid in Spanish.

[332] El ideal 742 (20/01/1907), p. 3 [originally in Spanish].

All the aforementioned references to L'alegria que passa that can be found across time and space prove that the piece became part of the popular imagery. People had it present as a metaphor for political criticism, as an analogy to denounce the cultural passivity in certain villages, or as an icon for parody. The mentions to these piece continued appearing throughout the years and can be found in multiple journals and press sources from many different localities across Catalonia, showing the large and continued validity that its message continued holding.

Since its premiere, L'alegria que passa has circulated among multiple and varied companies, theaters and halls, becoming one of the most performed pieces of Catalan theater, as well as a cultural symbol of Catalan culture known all across the region. From the largest theaters of the Barcelonian capital to the smallest halls of villager amateur companies, L'alegria que passa was performed in 50 different Catalan municipalities during the 25 years that the Catalan lyric theater movement lasted. The brevity of the piece and the different musical arrangements that Morera wrote (from full orchestra to piano with voice, as well as for small band), as well as the poetic quality of the text and the sociocultural interest that the topic aroused, made it possible for all kinds of troupes and venues to stage L'alegria que passa.

Many other lyric titles were programmed too throughout the years along L'alegria que passa, which proves that, although this title was definitely the one that enjoyed the greatest popularity, its dynamics of distribution were not an extraordinary case, but rather a standardized distribution model for the genre of Catalan operetta and musical comedies. The lack of an institutionalized Catalan operetta company with the so desired stable seasons of Catalan Lyric Theater was not an impediment for the successful distribution of this lyric drama. It actually served, as Morera intended, to provide a popular lyric repertoire that Catalan companies could take instead of having to look for Spanish zarzuelas.

Titles such as La reina del cor, Permeti'm! or Picarol also enjoyed a long life after their premieres in Barcelona. However, very little research has been performed to document and trace the performances of Catalan operetta, and scholars interpreted this genre as a failed project due to the lack of institutional continuity of the companies in the capital city. However, a large number of performances that have been documented in the case study of L'alegria que passa in different theaters, halls and recreational centers across many Catalan municipalities. This points instead to a large popular success of Catalan musical theater in the region during the period in which the nationalist movement promoted the establishment of this kind of repertoire.

Under the light of the results presented in this chapter, it becomes clear that the movement was not based on the continuity of a single institutionalized company dedicated to the Catalan lyric repertoire. As it was Morera's self-described intentions, it rather promoted a distribution model in which the operetta repertoire could be performed by any Catalan company that wished to do so in order to offer a popular replacement for Castilian zarzuela in their programs.

Accordingly, the right approach to fully understand the social and geographical reach of this repertoire is to trace and document the different performances given of each title by multiple troupes across the Catalan region. Only focusing on the short projects that took place in the capital aiming to institutionalize a stable company does not provide the full picture of the sociocultural reality of Catalonia and the spread of the repertoire. On this aspect, almost no research has been done, at least yet, to properly and systematically catalogue and document the genres of Catalan operetta and Catalan zarzuela, as well as the critical reception and performances of each piece.

Moreover, the contrast between the model of distribution paradigmatically exemplified by L'alegria que passa and the one used to spread the genre of musical visions is of notable remark. It shows that the differences between lyric genres were not only based on artistical or aesthetic criteria. They also followed different economic and organizational models, including the strategies to distribute and spread the repertoires that they correspondingly promoted as "the national genre".

These differentiated strategies on how to extend the social and territorial reach of each genre also deepen into the core idea of this thesis that the Catalan lyric theater movement was plural and segmented; that there were different groups and networks of people involved in the movement that represented different ideological approaches to the issue and proposed different strategies to reach their common goal, occasionally opposing each other in the process.

Section II

International influences and transnational processes in the definition of a Catalan lyric theater genre

Chapter 4:
(Inter)national cultural modernization and the importation of foreign trends

The Catalan lyric theater movement took place as part of the Catalan national awakening, based on cultural self-determination and a strong activist initiative. As Prat de la Riba explains in La nacionalitat catalana (1906)[333], the Catalan nation would have been silenced by the Spanish crown during the Modern Ages, but their revival or renaixença in the 19th century had to be confirmed now with new forms of national culture that would confirm the continuity of the national identity into modern times. Therefore, it was a consciously conceived movement of nation-building: they were actively constructing a modernized national culture.

The Renaixença movement was characterized by recovering the use of Catalan as a literary language of culture, restoring its past pureness through the employment of archaicism. Following the European Romantic aesthetics, they would empathize with regional traditions and history, focused on medieval glory, Catalan history, nature, and Romantic ideals, blending nostalgia with a call for cultural and political resurgence. One of the milestones of the period would be, for example, the reinstatement of the Jocs Florals [Floral Games] in 1859, a medieval poetic competition that became a cornerstone of linguistic revival[334]. Central to its literary output would be worth mentioning, for example, the epic poetry of Jacint Verdaguer, whose pieces L'Atlàntida (1877) and Canigó (1886) mythologized Catalonia's past while asserting its cultural distinctiveness[335].

Upon these laid foundations, followed the period of Catalan Modernism that encompasses the Catalan lyric theater movement. This fin-de-siècle cultural and artistic movement that emerged in Catalonia in the late 19th and early 20th centuries paralleled broader European trends such as Art Nouveau[336].

One of their main goals would be broadening the spectrum of national disciplines and strengthening, not only literature, but also visual and performing arts. The intention would be to define and settle national styles in the different disciplines of art, consolidating the national project through the constitution of a wholly integrated national culture. If Catalan Modernism (Modernisme) is mostly known for its architectural style, such as Antoni Gaudí's legacy, it also extended its influence beyond visual arts and literature into the realm of music. It's worth mentioning the Orfeó Català choral society, founded in 1891, dedicated to the harmonization and popularization of Catalan folk songs and the settlement of a national musical tradition.

In this context, musical theater became one of the main preoccupations. Since all the great European nations had their own national genre of opera or lyric theater, the Catalan peoples, in order to be legitimated as a nation, also needed their own lyric genre conceived without any foreign influence. However, there was no precedent in history to look back at, since Catalan stages had been filled mainly with Italian opera and Spanish zarzuela. Moreover, the long-lasting presence of foreign influences on the field became a concern for nationalist intellectuals. Therefore, they started to call for the need to theorize and implement a new genre that would respond to this need in national culture.

The newly settled Catalan culture had to be, though, modern: a confirmation that the Catalan historical tradition was still alive and up to date with the international European innovations. If they were claiming for the present existence of the Catalan nation, they had to move from the medieval historical legitimations to a real and contemporary action that would revitalize their nationalist position. Consequently, Catalan Modernisme is characterized by drawing from both folk traditions and contemporary European trends. Some of the most prominent expression in the musical field could be Enric Granados, whose piano suite Goyescas (1911) blended Romantic lyricism with modernist harmonic experimentation, and Isaac Albéniz, whose Iberia (1905–1909) synthesized Spanish folk idioms with impressionistic techniques[337].

On the dramaturgical field, the Modernist program planned the renovation and modernization of theater in two phases: firstly, the importation of foreign contemporary trends and styles; secondly, the assimilation of the foreign styles by local Catalan authors. One of their key objectives was also the translation of European "classics" to educate people on the international canon they wanted to become part of, since Catalan nationalism had a strong internationalist perspective.

Adrià Gual was especially dedicated to this task, which he initially promoted with his Teatre Íntim company, and that continued promoting as director of the dramatic season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, Pieces by Euripides, Molière, Marivaux and Shakespeare were staged in Catalan among other classics, as well as other European contemporary authors such as Hauptmann and Bjørnson. The perception that Gual had of the history of European theater can be also traced in the texts of other Europeist intellectuals of the period, like Romain Rolland[338].

This first phase was led by Modernists that rejected tradition, moral values, religion and all previous forms of culture in order to open up to the new future without any conditioning baggage. They implemented this cultural program by translating foreign authors that represented the latest innovative trends, such as Ibsen with naturalism[339] or Maeterlinck with symbolism[340], or the yet unexplored Wagnerism[341].

> "In the sea of our projects, we are sailing towards the creation of a free theater here, to bring winds from other lands that will refresh ours. Reforms can enter through theater better than through books: there is no need to read. Our town is a dead lake that we ought to make less turb and to unfold, turning it into a river of life that breaks useless locks and prevents stagnation. […]

The second phase of the Modernist program for culture implicated the synthesis of the imported trends with the national tradition. The foreign pieces that had been staged in Catalonia should present new models that would inspire local authors to think and create differently, blending avantgarde aesthetics with social critique and Catalan identity. Therefore, these innovations were eventually assimilated by tradition, modernizing the local culture, offering new referents to refresh it and change its appearance. Once played here, local authors started writing their own pieces in imitation of the foreign ones, using the same formal and dramaturgical characteristics and techniques. Breaking from the realist conventions of the period, playwrights embraced symbolism, decadence, and psychological depth, often staging conflicts between bourgeois morality and artistic idealism.

We can outstand Adrià Gual and Santiago Rusiñol adapting European symbolist drama, Ignasi Iglésias approaching naturalism, and Enric Morera inspiring his musical dramaturgy in Wagnerism as the most renowned authors of this phase[343], which would last from 1897 to 1903, encompassing Enric Morera's first stable season of Catalan lyric theater (1900/01). They assimilated naturalist scenographic constructions, Wagner's conception of the total work of art that interrelates the meanings of music and text, but the main influence came specially from symbolism with the use of light and color, the short format in one act, and the dramaturgical construction of the action as scenes that recreate situations and atmospheres without a narratorial explanation[344].

The result would be a contemporary and universalized form of national culture, but it created a big controversy on how these new trends could be considered the continuity of the national tradition, especially if they were imported from abroad and proposed a disruptive breaking from a historical perspective. Late modernist and proto-neoclassical artists that feared the loss of their identity because of the predominant rejection of their own traditional values in favor of foreign influences led a conservative turn reintroducing traditional content. They modernized the aesthetical appearance, but maintaining their moral values, religious references and folkloric elements in the content of lyric theater. This was also their way of preserving the characteristic elements that defined their national identity. They proceeded adopting the new external aesthetics, but reincorporating moral and religious values and folkloric elements as a revindication of national identity, understood as the modernization of the tradition

This process took place mainly in the field of lyric theater and was implemented through the theorization of a new genre that combined the newly imported aesthetics with the local movement of folklorism (the compilation of popular songs, tales and myths from the rural peoples), using this folkloric material as the main base for writing the new plays. Lluís Graner institutionalized this trend directing stable seasons of "musical visions" at the Sala Mercè[345] (1904–1907), the Espectacles-Audicions Graner[346] (1905–1908), and his collaborators in other cities as Terrassa (Ars-Lucis theater, 1906–1908[347]) or Girona (Saló Gerió, 1905–1909).

❖ The reception of Symbolism in Catalonia

Before the first official avant-gardist performance —considered to be the premiere of Alfred Jarry's Ubu Roi in 1896—, Symbolism demonstrated "a turning point inwards, away from the bourgeois world and its standards, to a more personal, private and extraordinary world". As Michael Kirby defines it, Symbolism supposed the start of a "hermetic avant-garde" in theater based on undramatic stasis, monological and self-contained forms, opposed to the antagonistic styles such as Futurism, Dada or Surrealism[348].

Symbolist theater was introduced in Catalonia with Maurice Maeterlinck's The intruder (1890), a one-act quintessential Symbolist drama that employs atmospheric suggestion, metaphysical dread, and poetic abstraction to explore the inevitability of death through the gradual intrusion of an unseen, ominous force upon a family awaiting the arrival of a sick relative. As a foundational work of the théâtre de l'inexprimé [theater of the unspoken], the play exemplifies Symbolism's rejection of naturalism in favor of evoking unseen realities[349].

Translated as La intrusa in Catalan, the play's abstract and suggestive style aligns with Symbolist principles, emphasizing mood and inner reality over explicit action. Through its sparse dialogue, symbolic elements, and an ominous, unseen presence, Maeterlinck constructs a "static drama" in which silence and anticipation become the primary vehicles of meaning[350]. The blind grandfather's heightened perception, the recurrent sound of a scythe, and the flickering lamp evoke an existential dread that transcends literal interpretation, constructing a liminal space where death operates as both an unseen intruder and an atmospheric condition.

The Catalan translation of the play, done by Joaquim Casas-Carbó and Pompeu Fabra, was published in the journal L'Avenç in August 1893. The following month, on September 10th, it was staged at the Casino Prado as part of the second Sitges Modernist Festival. The performance was accompanied by a presentation speech by Santiago Rusiñol, who had promoted the premiere in collaboration with Raimon Casellas.

This production is widely considered to mark the onset of a pivotal period of unification among Catalan modernist factions around the figure of Rusiñol, a prominent advocate of the decadent symbolism that Maeterlinck's oeuvre embodies. The poet Joan Maragall provided a defense of the piece in the Diario de Barcelona journal, asserting its status as a prominent symbol of the modernist movement. In addition, both the playwright Jaume Brossa and the musicologist Alexandre Cortada eventually voiced their support for the project led by L'Avenç, despite their initial hesitation to embrace the decadent style, as it supposed a rupture with the traditional moral standards of Catalan society[351].

Jaume Massó i Torrents, director of L'Avenç, regarded this second Modernist Festival as a point of convergence and general consensus in which all modernist intellectuals have been involved. However, the L'Avenç team recognized that they had reached a threshold of innovative ideas and that the Catalan literary scene required continuous exposure to diverse influences. Hence, they did not restrict their advocacy to defending symbolism alone, but extended it to encompass all contemporary literary movements that challenged Catholic traditionalism.

To this end, throughout the year 1893, L'Avenç published a compendium of all the aspects of European modernity that had to be imported to Catalonia. The journal intended to promote and facilitate the development of a contemporary Catalan culture that would align with the rest of modern European cultural trends by providing a guideline for Catalan modernist artists. Subsequently, in addition to those of Maeterlinck, the theatrical productions of Hauptmann and Ibsen, and the philosophical concepts of Nietzsche were also incorporated in their discourse[352].

Soon after this proclamation, at the end of the year, L'Avenç was closed due to the ideological shift of some modernist intellectuals toward anarchism and the subsequent ideological repression that ensued following the attacks on the Gran Teatre del Liceu by this radicalized sector. Within this milieu, the group led by Rusiñol proclaimed itself as the leader of Catalan Modernism, while Jaume Brossa and part of the collective that had formerly constituted L'Avenç positioned themselves as advocates of Ibsen's dramaturgy and gravitated around the newly founded magazine Catalònia.

The third Modernist Festival in Sitges coincided with the inauguration of Rusiñol's studio and showroom Cau Ferrat in 1894. The establishment of a modernist literary competition in Sitges, as well as his role as a jury member of the Jocs Florals competition in Barcelona consolidated Rusiñol's status as the lead figure of the modernist movement. However, he deliberately maintained a certain distance from the progressist Catalanism associated with the young republicans of Reus and Tarragona[353].

The fourth Modernist Festival didn't take place until 1897. In this edition, the festival was dedicated to the theme of lyric theater. For the occasion, the "Catalan opera" La fada [The fairy] was written, with a one-act libretto in Catalan language by Jaume Massó i Torrents and music by Enric Morera, drawing its theme from Catalan mythology and adhering to the precepts of total art and Wagnerian musical dramaturgy. La fada exhibited a seamless musical continuum avoiding the conventional division into numbers or scenes, while also employing the leitmotiv technique. It has been regarded as the consecration of modern musical principles and signified a foundational milestone in the establishment of a Catalan lyrical theater[354].

Although it was only performed once, the piece was met with great acclaim by Modernist critics and worked as a source of motivation for Enric Morera to continue composing more lyrical pieces for the theater in Catalan language, culminating in the establishment of the company known as the Teatre Líric Català in 1901. Despite his personal friendship and collaborations with the symbolist Rusiñol and the support received by the Modernist Festival, Morera's personal initiatives eventually approached naturalism and realism by the hand of his other colleagues Ignasi Iglésias —who became the stage director of his Catalan operetta company— and Àngel Guimerà.

One of the key authors influenced by these modernist ideas was Adrià Gual, who subsequently synthesized them in a scenic theory that merged symbolism with theater of ideas and Wagnerianism. After his attendance at the staging of The intruder in Sitges, Gual started to integrate Maeterlinckian Symbolism into his pieces through the absence of action, an ambivalent atmosphere, the intuition of imminent mortality, legendary references, and idealistic or allegorical conceptualizations. The influence of decadent symbolism is evident in the author's imminent pieces written after the premiere of The intruder, such as La visita [The visit] and L'últim hivern [The last winter][355], both signed on that same year, 1893.

In 1895, Gual unveiled his theory of artistic synthesis through the piece Nocturn, and in 1897 he exemplified with Blancaflor his conception of a new popular lyric theater based on the glossing of folk songs as elements that connected with the social collectivity. Subsequently, in 1898, Gual founded the Teatre Íntim company with the objective of serving as a platform for the promotion of European Modernist authors who were not affiliated with the commercial literary sector, as well as fostering and perpetuating a Catalan theatrical tradition[356]. As part of this project, the company premiered in January of 1899 L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by], a decadent symbolist piece of lyric theater in one act that represented the inaugural collaboration of the two primary exponents of Barcelona's modernism, Santiago Rusiñol and Enric Morera[357].

The great success of L'alegria que passa served as a pivotal reaffirmation of the Symbolist movement. As the magazine Catalònia observed, "decadentism, so improper of the spirit of the Catalans, has triumphantly entered our country[358]". In La Vanguardia, Roca i Roca underscored the Wagnerian essence of the piece, which proposed a synthesis of music, poetry, and plastic design. For him, the piece exemplified the "total work of art" notion that the Modernists held as the ideal to achieve[359], as it was vigorously advocated for in the journal Joventut when criticizing other pieces from the Catalan lyric repertoire.

L'alegria que passa was staged again in the fifth and final Modernist Festival in Sitges in July 1899. In comparison to the previous La fada, Morera's music adopted more popular topics and exhibited a shift towards nationalism, a tendency that would persist in his subsequent works[360]. Motivated by the great initial reception of the piece, Enric Morera would subsequently validate his intentions to establish a genre of lyrical theater that was authentically Catalan and originally written in Catalan language.

In order to achieve so, he rented the Tívoli theater for a short winter season and established the company known as Teatre Líric Català. The primary goal of the project was to commission and produce new Catalan lyric theater repertoire that would oppose and compete with the género chico repertoire of Castilian zarzuela, which had been firmly established in the Paral·lel avenue of Barcelona. The stage director for the project would be his colleague Ignasi Iglésias, with whom he had already premiered in this fifth edition of the Modernist Festival the lyric comedy La reina del cor [The queen of the heart].

The Teatre Líric Català season was inaugurated on January 12th, 1901 with L'alegria que passa, a title that would prove to be recurring in the project. Although the stage director was, as aforementioned, the naturalist playwright Ignasi Iglésias and the rest of the repertoire leaned towards this trend, the collaborations between Morera and Rusiñol continued for a short time. In fact, the two following symbolist pieces that Rusiñol wrote before moving on and abandoning decadent Symbolism for good, were written for Morera's lyric season: Cigales i formigues [Cicadas and ants] and El jardí abandonat [The abandoned garden].

While Rusiñol's piece had enjoyed a great initial success, Adrià Gual's first approach to lyric Symbolism had not been too welcomed. Along with L'alegria que passa, the Teatre Íntim company had premiered in 1899 his "folk song harmonized for the stage" Blancaflor, called by the same name of the actual folk song that was being glossed and staged. The public didn't understand the innocent of the piece and didn't connect with the emotional memories that it was expected to bring back, recalling the folk songs heard as a kid now presented on stage[361].

Gual, who was on stage playing the male lead character, was traumatized by the bitter experience of the public laughing at his piece. The failed premiere of Blancaflor left a deep personal scar for him that he still recalled decades later in his autobiography, making him halt his lyric projects[362]. After the following premieres of the original La culpable [The guilty woman] in December 1899 and the translation of Ibsen's piece Espectres [Ghosts] in March 1900 were also unsuccessful[363], Gual left to Paris for a couple of years, missing out the Teatre Líric Català season that took place on the meantime.

Eventually, both dramaturgs ultimately adapted their style to align with the expectations of the public and critics, embracing moderation. The harsh criticism received by the incipient neoclassical Noucentisme and the conservative nationalist Catholics led Rusiñol and Gual to abandon decadent aesthetics. Adrià Gual had to adjust his symbolist style in response to criticism of his decadent approach. The objective of cultural renewal could not be accomplished if theater was unable to engage and interact with the general public. Rusiñol also expressed a sceptic lack of confidence in the reception of his symbolist work, as he feared it would not be accepted by the public. In consequence, he suspended the production of his piece that was the most representative of decadent Symbolism, El jardí abandonat.

- Decadent Symbolism in Santiago Rusiñol's dramatic work

Santiago Rusiñol's Symbolist production was concentered between 1898 and 1901. His inaugural piece was the prose poem Els caminants de la Terra (The walkers of Earth, 1898), which was set to music by Enric Morera. It served as an inspirational foundation for his following dramatic pieces, L'alegria que passa (1898) and Cigales i formigues (1901), which share plot elements with the first prose poem, and also have their musical part composed by the same Enric Morera.

Both of these lyric dramas were performed during the first season of Teatre Líric Català, which took place at the Tívoli theater in Barcelona in 1901 under the sponsorship and direction of Morera. While L'alegria que passa enjoyed several performances and multiple productions across the Catalan region, Cigales i formigues would only be reprised, apparently in 1905 at the Centre de Lectura in Reus[364], and in 1908 in a Castilian version translated by Martínez Sierra as Cigarras y hormigas at the Príncipe Alfonso theater in Madrid[365].

In total, Rusiñol wrote three Symbolist lyric dramas following Symbolist aesthetics. El jardí abandonat (1900), with its musical sections composed by Joan Gay, was chronologically the second of these three to be written and was also initially programmed as part of the Teatre Líric Català season of 1901. However, Rusiñol did not trust that such a conceptual piece would be understood by the general public in a commercial production, which led him to withdraw the piece from the program of this lyric season[366].

However, El jardí abandonat still arose some interest and in the following years it was performed occasionally by amateur groups and in private evening of Catalan associations. For instance, the Centre Autonomista de Dependents del Comerç i de la Industria [Autonomist Centre of Industrial and Commerce Salespersons] celebrated a literary evening on November 12th, 1904, to inaugurate the sales year, which included musical performances by the Cercle Musical Bohemi and composer and pianist Joaquim Grant, as well as the reading of El jardí abandonat along the musical accompaniment written by Gay[367].

The following year, the association Catalunya Vella from Vic decided to stage the piece for the Sant Miquel festivities taking place on July 10th. Ms. Muntal played the marchesse and Ms. Tresols played the role of Aurora. The professional musicians from Unió Lírica played Gay's music conducted by Mr. Espadaler[368]. They must have played then an orchestral version of the music, which was not edited and whose manuscript is lost in the present day. The association Catalunya Vella played again El jardí abandonat in Vic on January 1st, 1908, with the music played by Unió Lírica, and they scheduled the piece again in June 9th in an event dedicated to the assistants of a congress dedicated to the history of the Crown of Aragon, although the title had to be replaced by another in the last minute due to the sickness of one of the actresses[369]. The piece remained among their repertoire, since on January 11th, 1920, Catalunya Vella performed again El jardí abandonat, along with L'alegria que passa and La nit de l'amor [The night of love], also lyric pieces by Rusiñol[370].

Other associations tried to arrange stagings of the piece, like Agrupació Regionalista from Terrassa in the summer of 1905. It was planned as the closing event of a local Modernist art exhibition, which included the author of the text as stage director, although the performance had to be rescheduled and eventually cancelled[371]. However, no commercial productions at a major theater would take place until 1928.

In a deeper approach to Rusiñol's literary style, the thematic symbol that recurrently appears and structures his symbolist oeuvre is the personification and juxtaposition of Poetry and Prose. These work as representations of the artist and the townspeople, of modernity and tradition. Rusiñol employs a variety of methods to formulate his message, with each piece highlighting a distinct emphasis on this same principle. This contrast is exemplified by Joanet and Zaira in L'alegria que passa, Aurora and Ernest in El jardí abandonat, and the hermit and the town girl in Cigales i formigues.

Zaira is employed in L'alegria que passa as a symbol representing art's capacity to revitalize and modernize a community stagnated in tradition and social immobilism, a circumstance that provokes a sense of burden and suffocation for Joanet. In El jardí abandonat, Aurora is interpreted as a representation of the decline of a bourgeoisie unable to regenerate itself, juxtaposed with Ernest's yearning for autonomy and external knowledge, a sentiment he shares with Joanet. While the town girl from Cigales i formigues is understood to symbolize a village that consumes and utilizes art to sustain its daily existence yet fails to acknowledge its necessity or value. This notion is also

Music is also suggestively used to emphasize this contrasted perception. L'alegria que passa includes musical parts throughout the act inserted as incidental music, so they would fit fluidly within the dramaturgical development of the piece, flowing along with the actions depicted on scene. Therefore, the music was mostly based on dances and marches of the visiting circus troupe, ambient working songs of the men in town and religious chants heard from the church that are actually being performed in the depicted action. While on the one hand it works as the sound landscape of a rural Catalan village, on the other hand it suggestively symbolizes the joy that the artists from the circus bring with their music in contrast with the intentionally boring and monotone local songs and religious chants.

All these ideas directly appeal to the modernist principle that culture must be the driving force behind the social regeneration that would break away from dominant imperialist structures. It would, moreover, promote the advancement of a society that had to adapt to the innovations of the industrial revolution and the new social and cultural models brought by productivism. Modern societies were beginning to move towards democratic and participatory models, in which the hierarchies of power and the imposition of ideas were declining. For this reason, cultural manifestations such as architecture, painting and, particularly in the Catalan context, the use of the national language in literature, were the means of bringing modern ideas to the masses and spreading them. Barcelona welcomed these ideas, as they converged with the notion of cultural self-determination, according to which Catalan society had to define itself, stating the differences that distanced it from Madrid, the imperialist capital of the kingdom[372].

The expectation was that the bourgeoisie would be the first to embrace these modernist ideas, disseminating them throughout the rest of society. However, the lack of mobilization among the Catalan bourgeoisie proved to be a significant obstacle in this regard. Their position was met with significant criticism from Rusiñol, as evidenced in his play El jardí abandonat. The piece portrays the decline of Aurora's family, signifying the end of her lineage due to her inability to modernize and embrace globalism, a choice that led to her self-imposed isolation.

The challenges associated with the reception of modernist art are also exemplified in Rusiñol's oeuvre through the representation in L'alegria que passa of a rural village where joy passes by in the form of a circus troupe that can't settle in because the inhabitants expel them before they finish their first performance, serving as a metaphor that reflects the societal preference for material wealth over artistic appreciation. This concept is further illustrated in Cigales i formigues by the village of ants, who ascend to the hermitage in the hope of a miracle that their financial affluence cannot provide, failing afterwards to acknowledge the poet as the agent responsible for their salvation.

In this piece, Rusiñol presents a group of "cicadas", who are artists enjoying their time by a chapel on the hill, complaining how little benefit they receive for their art and joking about how they have to feed themselves with their own poetries. People from the town in the valley, who are the working "ants", do not wish to share with them the profits of their work.

The piece starts with a cicadas' chorus, singing for Poetry to never abandon them. The same melody will be reprised again as an uplifting solo. It is made of an ascending succession of notes by seconds until they reach a fifth from the initial note (e.g. from D♯ to A), to then descend two seconds and end up with an ascending fifth (from F♯ to C♯) that if prolonged for more than a bar. The character of the melody is, therefore, uplifting and motivational, in a rhetorical movement as if reaching the heights of heaven with poetry.

The first ant from town that visits the artists by the chapel is the blind man, who arrives asking for mercy, since he has lost all his fortune and has realized that his soul was unnourished, eventually joining the rest of cicadas as one of them. After his visit, they see the whole town approaching on a pilgrimage. They arrive now singing themselves to ask the saint from the chapel for a miracle, after rejecting the cicadas and their songs in times of wealth. The ants chorus, in contrast to the cicadas allegro melody, will be heavily distressing. The tempo will be much slower and the voices will melodically progress by semitones, creating strong dissonances. The voices will mostly create a plain melodic design or descend.

The saint that they will find there is, actually, a poet, and the cicadas agree that the only possible miracle for them is "saint poetry". It can be symbolically interpreted as a pilgrimage to the temple of art, looking for a spiritual salvation through poetry. It has not rained in town for a long time and the drought is making them struggle, in a parallel state to their souls, which have not been fed with art and are in a deadly state inside of them, as described by the first blind man.

A girl from the crowd that used to be a cicada and left to town after becoming wealthy now supplicates the hermit-poet for a miracle in the shape of rain. An instrumental fragment is played very fast figures and tremolos on the chords to increase the tension while the hermit-poet preaches to them to embrace the purifying faith in poetry, to embrace the beauty of art in their lives. It is followed by a reprise of the ants chorus, after which it starts raining.

However, once their salvation arrives, they can only think of their wealth coming back, and they turn their backs again to the cicadas. They reason that it would have rained anyway and that miracles are not possible. The initial motif of the cicadas is reprised then by the winds and, after an apotheotic chord, the piece arrives to an end. Rusiñol is, again, criticizing the lack of support that Modernist artists received from society, as he did in L'alegria que passa.

Following Cigales i formigues, Rusiñol will redirect his dramaturgical creations towards the most conventional theater archetypes, thereby re-establishing a connection with 19th century sainetes or one-act farces and Costumbrismo style. This reorientation can already be glimpsed in the initial scenes of Cigales i formigues, as evidenced by the names given to the cicada characters and their jokes, who pursuit a comic effect[373].

Among his dramatic symbolist pieces, El jardí abandonat Rusiñol's closest approach to the decadent style, which works here to exemplify the constructive technique to create symbolic references. The primary device employed to construct these symbols and suggest these relationships between characters, objects, and ideas is the repetition of words. The original function of a word is to recall a specific meaning associated with it; however, its systematic repetition in association with other elements distances us from the real significate to which the term refers. Consequently, we end up dissociating the word from its meaning. The signifier loses its signification and, thereby, the word can be associated with another concept, interpreted as an abstract quality or a form, or it can even become an empty aural stimulation[374]. This use of language allows for the construction of symbolic references that characterize the symbolist style.

Therefore, it is possible to establish a correlation between a character and a flower by employing adjectives on the character that are congruent with those used to describe flowers, or by assigning them names derived from flowers. This method is employed, for example, in the construction of the symbol of Aurora in El jardí abandonat. The Marchioness refers to her granddaughter with the appellation "lily", comparing her with a "magnolia leaf", "all scent, all flower incense". Therefore, when speaking of flowers, we are speaking of Aurora.

Once this association is stablished, the signifier of the flowers acquires a new interpretation as a representation of life, which comes to an end when all the flowers are plucked from the garden throughout the play, resulting in a barren garden. Then, the metaphor of an approaching death is transferred to Aurora through the symbol of the flowers. The Marchioness eventually describes Aurora's voice as "delicate and beautiful like a flower from an umbraculum", as if she were "the last flower in a garden full of ruins". The decline of the flowers becomes the symbolic decay of Aurora herself and the end of her lineage.

Figure 100: El jardí abandonat (1898), painting by Santiago Rusiñol, in which the ambience of the later homonymous play will be inspired. [Personal collection].

[374] MAETERLINCK, Maurice; GONZÁLEZ SALVADOR, Ana (ed.) (2009): La intrusa; Los ciegos; Pelléas y Mélisande; El pájaro azul. Madrid: Cátedra, p. 37.

Therefore, when Aurora offers Lluís a "dead flower" that would make him remember her, or when Ernest tells her that he cannot take any living flowers with him to continue contemplating them from outside the garden because they would wilt, the flower is actually symbolizing Aurora. Ernest is unable to take her with him because Aurora is incapable of leaving behind the past symbolized by the garden that she is unwilling to step out of. Aurora can only offer Lluís a memory of her to be his companion on the journey beyond the garden's boundaries; she will not leave physically, but only as a memory[375].

To enhance the meaning of each word, the dialogues are concise; the fewer words there are, the more relevant each one is, and the more resonance and permanence it has in the mind of the recipient. Consequently, Rusiñol employs a highly sophisticated vocabulary that refers to the human senses and a synesthetic expansion of perception: "silent fountains", "uninhabited rooms", "salons of stillness", "the smell of fallen nobility", "the smell of ruins", "the color of twilight", or "the color of sadness" transform Rusiñol's abandoned garden, which rather evokes the aesthetic of a temple or cloister, a cemetery of mortuary beauty[376].

This reduction in the dialogues is accompanied by a general reduction in the length of the works, as evidenced by these three symbolist dramas by Rusiñol, all of which are lyrical one-act plays. The short form is an archetypal feature of Modernism, adapting to the accelerated sensibility of modern man. It presents a dramatic architecture that is not fragmented into acts, opposing the traditional Aristotelian model, which advocates for moderation, neither excess nor deficiency in the length of the play[377].

Nevertheless, Rusiñol eventually expressed a sceptic lack of confidence in the reception of this symbolist piece, as he feared it would not be accepted by the public. In consequence, he suspended the production of the piece that was the most representative of his decadent Symbolism, El jardí abandonat. It would not be commercially premiered until 1928, when it was revived for a tribute to the writer at the Romea theater. The piece was chosen due to the fact that, in contrast to the reprise of other Rusiñol's pieces —who, by that point, had become a living legend— El jardí abandonat was not as well-known and remained a novelty[378]. The performance took place at the end of the season, culminating with a production that was more of an homage, rather than a commercial strategy.

- The scenic theory of Adrià Gual

At the end of 1896, Adrià Gual presented Nocturn: andante morat, a purely Symbolist piece that marked the author's consolidation within the Symbolist movement. The introductory text that precedes the dramatic piece laid the foundations of Gual's conceptualization of the synthesis of the arts, in which is known as Adrià Gual's "scenic theory[379]", encompassing his later "popular theater" proposal and the theorization of his "Catalan folk songs harmonized for the stage".

Nocturn features two characters, the Walker and the Sister. The two protagonists find themselves in a desolate landscape and discover a castle that closes its doors for them. While spending the night outside, they have amorous dreams that make their return to reality all the more unbearable. The piece culminates when the two characters perceive a light at the depths of a pond, which is revealed to be the reflection of a star[380].

Maeterlinck asserted that "time is always relative to the individual who has the notion of it, that neither the past nor the future exist in an absolute sense, but rather everywhere and always eternally present[381]". In accordance with this, Gual's work is not set in a specific time or historical period, which would cause the notion of the present to be lost. Rather, it is set in a pseudo-medieval setting, which can be exemplified, for example, with the castle that the Nocturn characters arrive at.

In contrast to naturalist theater, Symbolist theater rejects positivist models of social analysis and does not accept that the observation and reproduction of reality is the principle of new artistic creation. Consequently, it generates spaces that are imbued with a sense of timelessness or mysticism, serving as catalysts for sensorial suggestiveness. The sets also deliberately avoid concreteness and naturalistic recognition of the scenes, thereby distancing themselves from realism. This artistic approach eschews the depiction of external reality with exactitude, instead favoring the evocation of a more suggestive and impressionistic experience.

Symbolist theater presents an internal action, showing the emotional states of the characters, which clash with each other's and generate a new type of dramaturgical tension, which is rather emotional. The action is static and does not seek to create intrigue or dramatic tension, based instead on a conflict of feelings. Moreover, these characters are not defined psychologically; instead, they are symbols in themselves. They do not represent an individual, but rather a more abstract idea or concept that cannot be materialized, such as death in Maeterlinck's The intruder[382].

Figure 102: Cover for one of the manuscript editions of Nocturn by Adrià Gual preserved at the Centre de Documentació i Museu de les Arts Escèniques in Barcelona, depicting the star in the sky and the flowers symbolizing the characters.

In Nocturn, Gual presents characters that are profoundly symbolic. One possible interpretation, given by Carles Batlle[383], is that the piece portrays rejection: the castle symbolizes society, which does not allow the pair of characters to enter. The walker and his sister also represent marginalization due to an incestuous desire between the siblings, which is never verbalized, but that is subconsciously expressed in their romantic dreams. Unable to live on the margins of society nor within the temple of art that the castle is, they see idealized death (the star reflected in the pond's water) as the only way out.

The introductory text preceding the piece, entitled Teoria escènica [Scenic theory], is considered to be one of Gual's most notable theoretical contributions. In this text, the author presents his vision of total art as a synthesis of dramatic text, music, and stage plastic design. Although Wagnerian theory unified text and music within the same dramaturgical conception, Gual notes that Wagner "neglected to consider that the right atmosphere in the plastic background of his dramas should be of great importance and should be treated with equal consideration as these other elements [text and music][384]".

Indeed, the emphasis on the visual aspect as an integral element of the overall artistic composition is a fundamental feature of the Symbolist tradition. Baudelaire and Mallarmé, focusing on the melodic and rhythmic combinations of words, had already dealt with the relationship between music and text. To this musical-literary dimension, Gual incorporates the visual and plastic emphasis design: the emotional intensity of the scene or the mood of the characters has to be meticulously matched to a specific color, thereby inducing a holistic synesthesia that transcends the conventional boundaries between the arts.

In the case of Nocturn, published in 1896, Gual applies the Modernist chromatic theory that he knows from the painting field to the performing arts. Although Gual developed his own theory on the relation between color and music in spoken theater as suggestive elements, this text was not published, and the manuscript has not been found[385]. In Nocturn, however, he does explore the connotations of the use of specific color as a suggestive element that strengthens the creation of a specific ambience along the rest of scenic elements.

The stage design is understood by Gual not only as mere decoration or background, but as a cohesive element. Hence, color is used here as a reflection of the inner spiritual state of the characters[386]. As Batlle states in his analysis of Gual's symbolist theory, this conception of color and space in the stage design transcends the Wagnerian "total work of art" and is directly linked to Symbolist influence.

Therefore, Gual pictures Nocturn in purple, from the characters' dresses to the cover of the published text and all the drawings of stage elements. As the subtitle of the piece indicates, "andante morat" ["purple andante"], the color that describes the general ambience of the piece is purple, but also a musical tempo is indicated.

As Gual indicates in the prologue, this should be the tempo used for the performance, so the slow acting provokes a feeling of stillness. The title itself, "Nocturn" [Nocturne], evocates the musical pianistic form, as well as a reference to the nighttime, since the events of the play take place during the night[387]. This premeditated use of color and music ensures a seamless integration of sensory experiences across disciplines[388]. The enhancement of nonverbal theatrical elements constitutes one of the primary characteristics of Symbolist theater.

Sound and music are, indeed, the nonverbal elements with the greatest potential for suggestion and are closely involved in the dramaturgical conception of Symbolist theater. The objects and the sounds that they produce, or those that can be heard on stage, generally possess a symbolic value that extends beyond their simple incidental presence on stage. In fact, it is common for Symbolist pieces to be adapted into operas, as in the case of Maeterlinck's Pelléas et Mélisande, performed at the Théâtre d'Art in Paris[389], or Oscar Wilde's Salome. The employment of synthetic dialogue, poetic language, and systematic repetition of words are among the symbolist characteristics that facilitate their adaptation to the operatic format.

Adrià Gual maintained close ties to the world of Catalan lyric theater. In 1897, he presented his proposal of a musical theater genre based on Symbolist suggestion with the piece Blancaflor. His theory was based on the staging of harmonized folk songs that would be glossed throughout the performance. These staged songs were supposed to recall the infant memories of the audience, awakening in them feelings of tenderness, innocence and joy. Learned through oral transmission from the parents, seeing them plastically staged and musically orchestrated was supposed to impress the public and move the audience's feelings, fulfilling their childhood dreams and fantasies.

Figure 104: Poster designed by Adrià Gual in 1896 for the Catalan Concert Society, depicting a tree-woman as an allegory of folk song. [Private collection].

In line with contemporary European modernist trends, Gual conceptualized folk songs as a means for achieving cultural modernization, arguing that they are spontaneous expressions of the people's soul. Aligned with the Catalan nationalist movement, he believed that glossing these songs could work as a tool for collective regeneration. In 1901, he described his vision for a theater based on mythology and folklore in the journal Joventut, coining the term "teatre popular" [popular theater][390].

His first piece of lyric theater was Blancaflor, a gloss of the homonymous folk song. The piece starts with a group of villagers that cross the stage while singing the folk song called [390] GUAL, Adrià; BATLLE, Carles (ed.); GALLÉN, Enric (ed.) (2016): Teoria escènica…, op. cit , pp. 19–22.

Blancaflor. According to Solanilla's analysis of the stage design, this first scene correspond to a depiction of Catalan rural reality of late 19th century, that the audience should perceive as verisimilarly real[391]. The central part of the piece takes us to a mythological space, an archetypical and atemporal place ideally portrayed, which takes us far from the previous rural reality, but is not perceived as fictional either[392]. During this scene, we can see on stage the characters from the folk song: Blancaflor is sitting under the mint tree near the sea, as the song narrates, waiting for her lover to come back from sailing. When he finally arrives and they reunite, the evocation ends and the initial set reappears, making the audience come back to reality.

The play paradigmatically shows Gual's vision of the lyric genre that he pretended to establish: folk songs and mythology are windows to escape reality and briefly travel to a world of bright and pure emotions. Theater is the means to bring that world to material reality, so the audience can dream with their eyes open and feel for a moment what it's like to see those scenes from the tales they listened to as kids, existing only in their imagination.

The central element that brings cohesion to both stage sets is the mint tree that appears in the middle of the stage in both designs. As Solanilla interpretates, this tree has, firstly, a metonymic significance, locating the scene in the nature, a place of cult for Modernist authors. Also, it has a metaphorical significance, symbolizing protection due to its concave shape, as a barrier protecting the inside. It has, as well, a third significance, an allegorical interpretation of love professed by a wife to her husband, mystically portrayed as eternal. The life of the tree is the life of cosmos, matching its growing[393].

The first scene presents the tree with no leaves, dead, symbolizing the decadence of present times. In the central part, the tree is grown, green and full of life, as a symbol of vitality[394]. The purity of Blancaflor's love brings vivacity to nature; the use of folklore to modernize culture, educating people on those moral feelings, will bring new life to the decadent present society.

Despite the modernity of Gual's proposal, treating the visual part of the play as a field of expression and not only decorative, insufflating metaphorical and allegorical meaning to the stage elements, his production was not very well understood by the public[395]. The audience did not understand the symbolic meaning of the stage design, and found the use of a folk song lame and childish. Therefore, the drafts that Gual had at the moment for other folk songs arranged for the theatrical stage were left, at least for the moment, not premiered.

In 1898, in response to the criticism received regarding his decadent symbolism, Gual began reading Ibsen's works, aiming to reconcile his differences with the defenders of theater of ideas. Silenci [Silence], a play that Gual started writing in late 1897, already shows some early signs of his dramaturgical change. Presented as an intimate drama, the play's message is not expressed directly. Instead, its meaning is conveyed through subtle details and signs that go unnoticed, based on the confusion and nuances of the real world[396]. The play depicts a day of burial and the neighbors who come to offer their condolences. Silence is the atmospheric protagonist, broken only by the chimes of the clock marking the passage of time in a very Maeterlinckian style.

Nevertheless, Silenci presents a past conflict in narrative style similar to Ibsen's, allowing the viewer to analyze the characters retrospectively and perceive the tensions between them caused by latent conflicts. The first act, which the author later rejected and eliminated, presented the events that provoked the characters' hidden passions in a more explicit and expository way. With the removal of this act, these passions can only be intuited in the second act[397].

The influence of the theater of ideas will not cause Gual to abandon the symbolism he had assimilated into his theater of feelings. Instead, he will adopt the most symbolic and suggestive aspects of Ibsen's characters' desire to transcend reality by imposing their individual aspirations. Thus, Gual's theater will surpass the decadent aspects of his early Symbolism, which had originally emerged as a response to the naturalist tradition within the French-speaking scene, defended by the Théâtre d'Art of Paris that Pual Fort founded in the late 1880s. Naturalist dramaturgy, represented by Zola and Ibsen, had, however, also emerged with the aim of breaking with Romanticism and previous traditions.

Both Symbolism and Naturalism share a fatalistic philosophical basis that portrays individuals as subject to external influences and pressures, leaving them without purpose or goals. However, the difference in their approaches lies in their conception of what oppresses humans: Naturalism presents individuals confronted with society's deterministic force, while Symbolism presents people's mental reaction to their inability to integrate into the world and cosmic orders[398]. By incorporating the symbolic dimension of determinism into Symbolist theater, Gual presents a form of positivist Symbolism opposed to Naturalist individualism. In this conception, the moral defeat of society and the lack of love justify the crisis of the individual, who now displays a free and willing attitude whereby death is no longer the only liberating solution.

The tendency that Gual follows in his work is to gradually abandon legendary references to medievalist mythology and to move his intimate dramas from being secretive, as Silenci was, to being totally externalized, bringing back to his dramaturgy the elements of recognition and the idea of dénouement or literary resolution of the plot. This way, Gual manages to win the favor of the public and is especially recognized after the premiere of Misteri de dolor [Mystery of sorrow] at the Teatre de les Arts in 1904[399]. However, in that same year, Gual was hired as stage director for Lluís Graner's theatrical projects, which revived his theory based on folkloric symbolism.

According to his biographical statement, Gual would have joined the project due to the personal friendship he held with Graner, as well as for his economic necessity to fund his personal dramatic projects[400]. Eventually, Gual would abandon the project at the end of the 1905/06 season due to personal misunderstandings with Lluís Graner and he would pursue his own stage projects away from the Symbolist aesthetics.

❖ The conservative impulse led by Lluís Graner

Catalan lyric theater has been so far defined as a movement that occurs during the Modernist period and is distinguished by two distinctive phases. The initial one is characterized by a disruptive Modernism driven by an avant-gardist impulse, which involves a deliberate deviation from established traditions through the importation of foreign trends. The subsequent step would be the phase of assimilation, by which local artists start imitating these foreign styles, contributing to the movement's dissemination and adaptation within the national cultural landscape. It is important to note, however, that this process was eventually faced by a traditionalist response, indicative of a conservative shift which ultimately led to the end of Modernism, transitioning into a neoclassical period called Noucentisme[401].

We can see traces of the conservative ideology since the inception of Modernisme: Adrià Gual in 1897 theorized the first model of Modernist lyric theater based on staging traditional folklore that he publicly exemplified with his piece Blancaflor. Nevertheless, he was radically silenced by the critique, which typically exhibited an aggressive tone towards proposals that fell out of the scope of their accepted aesthetics.

Gual was, in fact, one of the authors that suffered the worst critical backlash when presenting either disruptive scenic proposals or modernized conservative ones:

> "Here [in Catalonia] […] low intelligence reigns supreme, hand in hand with malice, that is, the opposite of what one imagines the perfect critic should be, accepting that it is necessary. [...]
> Criticism as it is practiced today is destructive rather than constructive. Who else but critics prevent the formation of critical thinking, making people believe that they are excused from thinking, from being themselves, because they are sheltered and live off their «mentor»? When they see or feel something that they are told is art, they don't even dare to form their own little opinion; they have to wait and see what the critic will say about it to know what to think, something that they agree to do on a daily basis... For one peseta a month, they are given everything ready-made... undoubtedly, in these times of progress, we have arrived at the solution to the great problems.

[401] The word "Noucentisme" plays with the polysemic meaning of the Catalan word "nou", which means "nine", but also "new". They were claiming that the culture for the nineteenth hundreds (the 20th century) should also be renewed, leaving behind the eccentricity of Modernism.

> On the other hand, artists, writers, and all those who produce «criticizable» works feel the influence of the printed word, and if they lament the unfavorable opinion of their critics in a low voice, they are careful not to do so aloud, because one must «know how to live» and it is not advisable to upset the masters of public opinion. But the ridiculous remorse of the shameful criticized ones does not end there; it goes even further, reaching the unconscious aspiration to please the critic they detest and sacrificing their work to achieve their approval in the form of a «review». > Adrià Gual[402]"

Given the plurality of ideologies within the nationalist movement, it was easy to find confrontation from journals defending a different cultural ideal. However, within the spectrum of international influences that were being received at the moment, the authors that followed the aesthetics of decadent symbolism —as Adrià Gual did in his Blancaflor[403]— faced special opposition[404].

While symbolism itself did not present a problem, it was the "decadent" part of it what was heavily criticized under identitarian and religious arguments. In this interaction between Modernism and the nationalist ideals, part of the Catalan nationalist intellectuals did not accept the decadent style in their national literature, since their program for modernizing the national culture was based on its revitalization as the main principle. Hence, the national identity had to be portrayed as vitalist, still present and alive, not as something in decay or crumbling. It was in 1904 when, under the fear of losing their traditional culture and way of life, the cultural conservative turn started to take place.

The initial Modernist cultural renewal had been based on importing foreign trends, rejecting the traditional and moral values from the construction of a modern national culture, especially the religious ones. This, summed up to the arrival of socialism, labor movements, anarchism, anticlericalism, etc., made the conservative intellectual bourgeoise feel a real fear of losing its identity, its values and its way of life. These initial Modernist ruptures with tradition triggered a reaction that led the conservative intellectual bourgeois to take action: they invested in new companies and theaters that implemented their newly conceived genre of the "musical visions" and they took the direction of the institutional associations to redirect the Catalan lyric theater movement.

This conservative turn also coincided with the introduction of a new generation of authors and artists. The initial phase of Modernism had been led by Ignasi Iglésias (1871–1928), Santiago Rusiñol (1861–1931), Enric Morera (1865–1942), even counting with the participation of some Romantic authors reconverted to Modernism, such as Àngel Guimerà (1845–1924). Now, the conservative impulse is led by Lluís Graner (1863–1929), who defended a traditionalist and Catholic Modernism, based on the theories of Adrià Gual (1872–1943) and backed up now by the young Josep Carner (1884–1970), Rafael Masó (1880–1935), Joan Llongueras (1880–1953), and other young collaborators that were welcomed in the companies of musical visions.

We can explain this reaction based on the concept of conservative impulse by Peter Waldmann[405], based itself on the concept of conservatism by Peter Marris. According to it, change is perceived as an experience of loss. Therefore, a forced adoption of radical modernity is felt as a loss of tradition, identity and values. These radical progressist changes tend to provoke a reaction from the conservative sides that spontaneously start taking action to recover the control of the leading institutions and movements to redirect their actions. This was also the case of Catalan Modernisme in the field of lyric theater.

This conservative impulse started to be translated into real action in 1904. Firstly, Josep Carner sponsored the edition of the text of Blancaflor by Adrià Gual, which had been left unpublished after the failure of its premiere on stage[406]. Upon Gual's lyric theory exemplified in Blancaflor, Lluís Carner conceived the genre of "musical visions" based on Gual's concept of modern popular theater. On autumn of that same year, Graner opened the doors of the Mercè hall in the Rambla of Barcelona, offering Adrià Gual the position of stage director, while on the meantime Gual was also being named president of the association for the promotion of Catalan lyric theater[407].

Their leadership of the movement was officially consolidated in 1905, when Lluís Graner rented the Principal theater of Barcelona to stablish there his company Espectacles-Audicions Graner. They had officially taken control of the institutions to implement their desired repertoire and redirect the cultural trends. In this venue, Gual's librettos for his previously halted "folk songs harmonized for the stage" project were recovered and premiered. Els tres tambors [The three drummers], with music by Morera, and La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida], with the musical collaboration of Jaume Pahissa, were successfully premiered during the 1905/06 season[408]. The third one that Gual had left written during his lyric attempt between 1897 and 1899, L'estudiant de Vic [The student from Vic], was announced for the 1907/08 season, but it was not eventually scheduled due to the economical struggles of the company to keep up with the orchestral expenses.

The musical visions reincorporated traditional folkloric content, but maintaining the Symbolist dramaturgy and its formal modern characteristics. The symbolist musical visions would stage folk songs and legends, combining the orchestrated glossed songs, folk poetry and spectacular set designed with colorful electric lighting effects. Their aim was to modernize folk oral heritage and produce a first-level sensorial experience that would result attractive to the urban audience. The decadent style, however, was left aside and they adopted a vitalist approach to Symbolism that portrayed better the liveliness and vigor of the Catalan nation, looking to provoke the exaltation of the national feeling through sensorial suggestiveness with poetry, music and plastic effects. The medievalist aesthetics, the quotation of archaic folklore and Catalan vocabulary, and the presence of Catalan nobility between the characters were symbolic elements of the historically legitimated Catalan nation that continued on in the present.

The genre of musical visions arrived in the following years to several cities across Catalonia, such as Terrassa, Manresa, Girona, Tarragona or Reus, creating a network of halls especially dedicated to the production of musical visions. Many of the promoters and sponsors were artists, mostly painters that decided to experiment with lighting on stage designs and live combinations of colorful spotlights on the scene backdrops, such as the cases of Joaquim Vancells in Terrassa or Francisco Cuixart in Manresa, besides Lluís Graner himself.

As well, many others were priests from the nationalist branch of Catalan church that decided to become part of the renovation of the scenic repertoire. They got involved in this task by writing and staging musical visions to engage civil society in moral activities that promoted Catholic and Catalan devotion under modern aesthetics. Such cases were Antoni Doltra in Olot and Jaume Bofarull in Tarragona. Hence, all the promoters were linked either by artistic and/or ideological premises, forming a collaborative network of halls in which some venues arrived to share some titles of their repertoires, even lending to each other the stage sets and costumes.

However, once Lluís Graner emigrated to America in 1909 due to the bankruptcy caused by his economic mismanagement of the Principal theater of Barcelona, the smaller halls in the network of musical visions started to cease their activity. The younger authors that would substitute him in the leadership of the lyric movement had different needs and proposals to define their generation. The neoclassical Noucentisme started to become a defined movement, and it would end up leaving behind the Modernist forms of theater to go back to the classical forms of multiple-acts dramas, big operas and great narrative development of the dramatic action, eventually completing the outthrowing of disruptive Modernism. The initial conservative turn given within Modernism would be radicalized into a completely conservative revindication of neoclassical forms.

Analyzing the historical avant-gardes, Jean Clair defined the role that artistic tradition played on the gestation and development of the new avant-gardes[409]. In response to formalist historiography, he proposed an evolution of art based on movements of disruptive avant-gardism that break from tradition, which are eventually assimilated and end up modernizing the tradition they broke away from. Repeating the cycle, a new avant-gardist response would break again from the modernized tradition.

Constanza Nieto presents Clair's avant-gardist dynamics through the metaphor of a tandem bike to understand the general evolution and movements of art throughout the 19th and 20th centuries[410]. In this comparison, we would understand avant-gardism as a disruptive tendency that wanted to break from tradition and the modernity as the later assimilation, forced to catch up with the avant-gardist trends, adapting them into the traditional schemes to create a new, renovated but still recognizable product.

These dynamics between an avant-gardist movement that forces the modernization of tradition can also be seen in the reception of Symbolism as part of the inner development of the Catalan lyric theater movement. The result of a conservative impulse renovating theater of Catholic and traditionalist content with modernized aesthetical forms has to be understood through the previous forced cultural renovation imposed by the initial phase of disruptive Modernism.

Following the Modernist program, a plan to renovate the national culture was unfolded, during which foreign contemporary authors were translated into Catalan and their styles were subsequently emulated by Catalan authors to revitalize the local culture. Santiago Rusiñol and Adrià Gual were captivated by the theatrical Symbolism represented by Maeterlinck. Both defended the reception of his work and began to write and stage their own productions following his decadent style.

Symbolist aesthetics were mainly developed in the field of lyric theater, following the ideal of sensorial suggestion through the combination of poetic texts, plastic images and music. New musical dramaturgies were rehearsed by Enric Morera as the composer for the music in Rusiñol's lyric dramas, as well as after Adrià Gual's theorization of the "folk song harmonized for the stage". Morera explored the use of incidental music in L'alegria que passa as a suggestive element that leads the audience towards how they should perceive the nature of the characters in the play. Meanwhile, Gual theorized a motivic use of orchestrated folk songs in which music presented a harmonic continuum above which the folk motif flowed repeatedly, passing through the different instruments and varying the texture, density, tempo and key to express the emotional variations according to the development of the piece, as the composer Granados essayed in Blancaflor.

In response to the initial abrupt and radical cultural modernization, an eventual backlash took place to revindicate the national tradition, modernizing it by assimilating the new imported styles. A conservative impulse, rather common in contexts of radical progressist change, reintroduced traditional and folk content into the new forms and aesthetics to preserve the elements of the national identity. Once Rusiñol had detached himself from the Symbolist lyric project, the approach to lyric theater formerly theorized by Adrià Gual was revived by Lluís Graner for the further development of the repertoire. The implementation of his theory on popular theater approached the staging of folk songs in the genre of "musical visions" from a Modernist perspective of cultural regeneration rather than from a traditional folklorist standpoint.

The genre of "musical visions" would revive the glossed staging of folklore in a vitalist key, influenced on the one hand by Catholic ideology as a celebration of life and, on the other, by nationalist ideology, which vindicated the present vigor of Catalan national identity. According to his biographical statement, Gual would have joined the project due to the personal friendship he held with Graner, as well as for his economic necessity to fund his personal dramatic projects[411]. Eventually, Gual would abandon the project at the end of the 1905/06 season due to personal misunderstandings with Lluís Graner and he would pursue his own stage projects away from the Symbolist aesthetics.

Ultimately, after Graner's bankruptcy and the dismantling of his lyric project, Gual's dramaturgy continued its shifting towards a style that was more easily comprehensible to the general public, leaving behind his Symbolist period. The conservative tendency was embraced and continued by the young upcoming generation and the following neoclassical movement, which eventually revindicated also the revival of traditional form, redirecting their interest to the traditional opera genre, as exemplified by the adaptation of the musical vision La presó de Lleida by Gual and Jaume Pahissa as an opera premiered in 1928, or by the opera El giravolt de maig (1928) with libretto by Josep Carner, who had been the first literary arranger of musical visions at the Mercè hall.

In conclusion, the early foundational repertoire of Catalan lyrical theater was significantly influenced by Symbolism. It is within this context that the relevance of the Catalan lyric theater movement in the cultural modernization of Catalonia can be acknowledged. The influence of this movement transcends the field of music, acting also as a catalyst for the dramaturgical avant-garde.

Morera's and Graner's lyric projects were used to project, in the form of mass cultural productions for the big stage, the latest Modernist trends that intellectuals were experimenting with in the theatrical and literary fields. They popularized the avant-garde through a pedagogical initiative aimed at educating the public and elevating the artistic level of Catalan culture. Moreover, the reception of Symbolism and its direct impact on the development of a national lyric genre that are explained in this chapter reinforce, again, the argument that the Catalan lyric theater was a plural movement, not only influenced and focused on imitating the Wagnerian model as most literature so far have portrayed.

When thinking of multifaceted and multidisciplinary Catalan artists, Adrià Gual i Queralt (1872–1943) is one of the figures who should come to mind. The artist's professional scope encompassed a wide range of disciplines, including painting, poster art, and lithography, as well as playwriting, stage direction, set design, or even screenwriting and film production. A substantial corpus of studies and doctoral theses has centered on these aspects of his professional career[413]. However, one aspect that has received less attention is his dedication to the Catalan lyric theater movement, whose direction and development was profoundly shaped by Gual's theoretical and practical contributions.

A brief analysis of Adrià Gual's contribution to Catalan lyric theater reveals his extensive involvement during the period of activity of this initiative. It can be considered that the starting point for this lyric movement was the premiere of the lyrical drama La fada, with music by Enric Morera and libretto by Jaume Massó i Torrents, at the Modernist Festival in Sitges in 1897. The next major premiere, to which a previous chapter of this dissertation is dedicated, already took place under the umbrella of Adrià Gual. L'alegria que passa, which featured music also by Morera and a text by Santiago Rusiñol, premiered on January 16th, 1899, by the Teatre Íntim company, which had been founded and was directed by Gual.

Two weeks later, on January 30th, the same company premiered a "folk song harmonized for the stage" titled Blancaflor. It was Gual's first lyric contribution, which was followed by a long string of other staged folk songs and "musical visions". With Blancaflor, Gual introduced his own genre of lyric theater based on the glossing and staging of folk songs, tales, and popular legends; that is, elements of folklore that were considered representative of Catalan cultural identity and, in addition, oral transmitters of language, moral lessons and teachings.

While the lyrical drama initially promoted by Morera assumed the dominant position in the Catalan lyrical initiative, subsequent to its financial collapse and the profound intellectual disapproval of a significant segment of the Catalanist movement, the movement underwent a pronounced shift toward Gual's lyric proposal. This shift culminated in Gual being appointed as the artistic director of the Foment del Teatre Líric Català association in October 1904. The following month, the Mercè hall was inaugurated on Rambla dels Estudis in Barcelona[414] under the patronage and artistic direction of the painter Lluís Graner, turned now into a theater entrepreneur, who began experimenting with the genre of "musical visions", based upon Blancaflor's proposal under a vitalist lecture.

Gual was involvement in the Mercè hall project since its very beginning in the capacity of stage direction. The following 1905/06 season witnessed his relocation to the Principal theater in Barcelona, again under the patronage of Lluís Graner, where three "musical visions" with text by Adrià Gual were premiered. This genre became the new focal initiative of the movement, with Gual serving as the dramaturgical theorist and Lluís Graner acting as the artistic promoter and patron. Ultimately, a regional network of venues dedicated to staging musical visions emerged, reaching multiple Catalan municipalities such as Terrassa, Tarragona, Reus, or even Girona.

Despite Gual's early disengagement from Graner's enterprise —as he already foresaw a negative economic balance—, musical visions remained on Catalan programs until approximately 1911, when Lluís Graner precipitately went into exile in America due to bankruptcy that his theatrical adventures caused him. In consideration of the aforementioned context, it can be asserted that the genre conceptualized by Adrià Gual with Blancaflor —eventually designated as "musical visions"— played a pivotal role in the establishment of a distinct national genre of Catalan lyric theater.

In addition to his contributions as a writer and stage and artistic director, Gual also authored several theoretical and critical writings in which he analyzes in depth the situation of lyric theater in Catalonia: its historical trajectory, the influences it has received, and what proposals he considers appropriate to bring the genre to fruitful realization. The most pertinent theoretical texts by Adrià Gual have been transcribed in the edition of Teoria escènica prepared by Carles Batlle and Enric Gallén in 2016. Regarding Gual's reflections upon lyric theater and the Wagnerian influence, it's worth noting the following ones:

- "El teatre modern: innovador?" ["Modern theater: innovative?"] (c. 1898-1899).
- "El Teatre Popular. Pla-estudi llegit en l'Associació Popular Regionalista" ["Popular Theater. Blueprint read at the Regionalist Popular Association"] (02/04/1901).

- "El Teatre Líric Català" ["Catalan Lyric Theater"]. Speech given at the ceremony of office assumption as director of the Foment del Teatre Líric Català association (17/10/1904).
- "De plàstica wagneriana" ["About Wagnerian plastic arts"]. Article published at La veu del vespre (20/02/1934).

These documents represent the most specific, developed, and intellectually refined primary sources that describe the concerns of the members of the Catalan lyric theater movement.

Other significant authors within this movement, such as Enric Morera, have demonstrated a preference for practical and pragmatic criteria, focused on the actual stage practice instead of the conceptual theorization. Conversely, Lluís Graner has minimal written documentation concerning his motivations to produce and sponsor lyric theater, with the exception of some newspaper articles about his figure based on interviews with him, and the administrative documents and correspondence from his corporate entity, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

As one of the leading representatives and theorists of the movement for Catalan lyric theater, the present chapter will analyze Adrià Gual's public speeches and writings in search of references to Richard Wagner. The purpose of this analysis is to comprehend the extent to which Wagner's influence is manifest or pertinent to Gual's conceptualization of a national lyric theater genre.

During this period, references to Richard Wagner (1813–1883) were consistently present in reviews, opinion pieces, and news articles in the press. The efforts to establish a Catalan lyrical genre occurred parallel to the fervent reception of Wagnerian musical drama in Barcelona[415]. It is worth noting that, between the aforementioned premieres of L'alegria que passa and Blancaflor by Gual's Teatre Íntim, Die Walküre was premiered at the Gran Teatre del Liceu on January 25th, 1899. The inaugural season of Enric Morera's Teatre Líric Català in 1901 also took place between the premieres of Siegfried in November 1900 and Götterdämmerung a year later. Therefore, the Wagnerian contextual references were inevitably present.

Despite the absence of overt references to Wagner in newspaper critiques of Catalan lyric theater, some ideological factions within Catalan nationalism advocated for the production of opera with Wagnerian characteristics, particularly as disseminated in the journals Joventut, Art jove, and Catalònia. These advocates placed significant emphasis on the interrelation of music and text, albeit without providing any technical specifications regarding the realization of this union. They further advocated for the use of leitmotifs and the creation of large-scale, three-act pieces, given that Catalan lyric theater, in contrast to opera, used to be conceptualized as a concise, single act.

Subsequent literature and research on Catalan lyric theater during the Modernist period frequently cite the term "Wagnerian" and regard the repertoire as if its artistic goal was to imitate Wagner's musical drama. This preconception has led to a tendency to seek out Wagnerian characteristics in the repertoire or to criticize it for lacking them. Consequently, a reorientation of this perspective is proposed here, commencing with an examination of Catalan lyric theater theories and repertoire to discern if there was any real similarity or influence whatsoever regarding Wagnerism or other international references that were present at the time[416].

Following a thorough analysis of Gual's essays, a comparative analysis will be conducted between the extant theoretical discourse and the practical outcomes, employing pragmatic criteria to ascertain how the alleged Wagnerism is manifested in the premiered works. In other words, an analysis will be conducted on Adrià Gual's theories concerning the Catalan lyric movement in order to trace the reception and synthesis of Wagnerian ideas in his own stage theories, as well as on the manner in which these Wagnerian characteristics were applied in the practice when staging musical visions.

[415] MOTA, Jordi (2001): "Historia de la Associació Wagneriana". Wagneriana castellana 40.
[416] A noteworthy contribution can be observed in the work of Francesc Cortès (2005), wherein he already emphasizes the symbolic utilization of Wagner's references, rather than a real compositional imitation in the practice. Within the context of Catalan nationalist discourses, Wagner symbolized a divergent approach from traditional Mediterranean influences. This subject will be revisited later in the chapter.

❖ Local and international historical legitimation

One of Adrià Gual's main concerns when it came to consolidating a new national lyrical genre was its historical legitimacy. A central question guiding his efforts concerned the proposal's integration into the prevailing national tradition: how can it be perceived as continuing the national heritage if, at the same time, it proposes a cultural renewal that breaks with traditional Italian and Castilian influences?

To this end, Gual undertakes a comprehensive historical analysis of the local lyrical tradition and the reception of the foreign repertoire in Catalonia, meticulously selecting the figures of artistic and moral quality that merit continuation: Josep Anselm Clavé (1824–1874) and Richard Wagner. By incorporating both domestic and international elements, he establishes a duality in his references, thereby legitimizing himself within the national tradition and in relation to the broader international context, particularly with regard to the Germanic tradition. This phenomenon is achieved through the utilization of two prominent figures from the preceding generation, who are regarded as his immediate successors in time.

On the one hand, the folklore movement associated with the Catalan Renaixença and the rise of nationalism in the 19th century embarked on the collection of popular songs from rural areas in an effort to preserve and document national culture. These songs worked as a source of inspiration for numerous composers, who harmonized them and incorporated them into their choral repertoires.

Josep Anselm Clavé played a pivotal role in the establishment of choirs among Barcelona's working class[417], an initiative that "aided workers in overcoming their habit of loitering, while cultivating their aural sensibilities, fostering a devotion to study, and showing them the path to an aesthetic aspiration that has been transmitted from generation to generation[418]". As a result, they would be distant from other forms of entertainment that were regarded as intellectually inferior and morally degenerate.

[418] GUAL, Adrià (1904b): El Teatre Líric Català, op. cit.

Gual and other Modernist intellectuals specifically disapproved of theatrical genres that intended to be mere instrument of "public exploitation, tickling [the audience] with verses aimed to produce the laugh of the shopkeeper and, afterwards, the weeping of the follower of serialized novels[419]".

At the beginning of the 20th century, the choral movement was still very alive. During Catalan Modernisme, it experienced a flourishing period, as evidenced by the work of Aureli Capmany and his compilation project Cançoner popular català, in which Gual himself and Lluís Graner collaborated as illustrators. The first volume of the series was published in 1901 and the project lasted until 1913, when the 100th song was published[420].

The most prominent continuators of this choral tradition were Enric Morera and his ensamble Catalunya Nova, as well as the Orfeó Català led by Lluís Millet, whose "music palace" remains as one of the architectonical gems of Modernism. Consequently, Gual's proposal was to use that prevalent enthusiasm for traditional songs among workers' choirs and adapt the repertoire for its dramatized staging. This approach is exemplified by his first lyric piece Blancaflor, whose subtitle translates to "folk song harmonized for the stage".

The goal established by the Catalan lyric theater movement under Gual's leadership was to develop a mass show out of this choral tradition that would perpetuate the dissemination of folk Catalan songs —which embodied the essence of the national identity— to a larger urban audience, particularly aiming for families and children as their primary target audience. Their objective, which positioned them as continuators of Clavé's social work, was to revitalize traditional culture, rendering it appealing to the emerging modern industrial society and competitive with other cultural expressions.

The movement sought to achieve this by modernizing the presentation of folk pieces, incorporating into the staging advanced electrical technology for special lighting effects, such as the musical visions had. However, this internal program of the movement remains rather implicit, while Adrià Gual's public discourse focuses on the vindication of Wagnerian dramaturgy and the Wagnerian use of medieval legend as a nationalizing and, at the same time, transnational element.

[420] VILAR I HERMS, Ramon (2017): "La recolección de la canción popular en el ámbito de la lengua catalana". Boletín de Literatura Oral, extraordinary vol. 1, pp. 245–272.

In contrast to what he considers to be "melodic" lyric theater, which emphasizes catchy melodies, and easy listening —exemplified by Italian opera or Castilian zarzuela—, Wagnerian musical drama represents, in Gual's view, the pinnacle of "literary" lyric theater. This literary approach marks a significant shift in the musical narrative: the music is not presented in the conventional style of closed numbers with abrupt transitions from declamation or recitation to singing. Rather, both elements interact in a more fluid and natural manner, creating a seamless integration of musical and literary elements.

Librettos, as true theatrical pieces, should not work as an excuse for singing that breaks with theatrical verisimilitude. As Gual asserts, "lyric theater must be a consequence of literary theater, that is to say [...] a step further along the broad path of the most refined ideals[421]". Wagnerian musical drama will work as a clear example of these dramaturgical pretensions, as Wagner himself had previously advanced this argument in defense of his own musical drama against the frivolity of Meyerbeer's French grand opéra, a type of theater that Gual also finds "full of apparent complications and annoying noises, portraying a wisdom that we do not yet know if it was true[422]".

Furthermore, Gual dismisses Naturalist dramaturgy and Ibsen's theater of ideas, deeming them to be excessively cold for the audience and overly dependent on logical reason. Theater must resonate with its audience, and it is the sentiment it elicits that works as the catalyst for the spectator's introspection. Consequently, the message should not initially be processed by the mind, but rather, it should be perceived as an emotional impulse devoid of rationality[423].

If we are to avoid the tendency toward "romantic kitsch", it is within the realms of both popular folklore and mythology that we find the suggestion of "endless and always noble passions, which are the healthiest strengthener of human feelings", such as "kindness, heroism, and beauty". As Gual asserts, "all that has endured in the realm of profound aesthetic values has emanated from folk sources, emerging as the progeny of traditions and legends[424]". Therefore, Wagner's employment of mythology is assumed as a precedent for Gual's Catalan folk songs harmonized for the stage, establishing a legitimizing connection between the national proposal and the desired European internationalism.

Based on these references, the legitimacy of the Catalan lyrical genre, as defended by Adrià Gual, is substantiated in his discourse by three interwoven axes. Firstly, the Catalan tradition works as the foundation for this repertoire, seen as successor of Clavé's popular choral societies. Secondly, the international precedent established by Richard Wagner — consolidator of folk mythology as the basis of national lyrical theater— provides a recognized legitimation in the European context. Thirdly, the pedagogical and moralizing function that this folklore must exert on modern society, in contrast to other genres with a potential to corrupt its ethics and morals, works as a crucial point of national discussion.

❖ Chronological aspects of Wagner as modernizer

A primary concern of Catalan nationalism was the modernization of culture through the reception of contemporary international authors. In this way, the current European scene could work as a reference point for the renewal of national culture. Consequently, the works of renowned playwrights such as Maurice Maeterlinck, Gerhart Hauptmann, and Henrik Ibsen were translated and staged. In the field of lyric theater, Richard Wagner emerged as a crucial figure, serving as a paradigm for modernization. However, an examination of the historical timeline reveals the necessity to bypass a couple of generations to connect Wagner to the young authors involved in Catalan lyric theater.

Between Modernist authors such as Adrià Gual or Enric Morera and those only a couple of decades older, but already pertaining to the previous aesthetic movement of the Catalan Renaixença, such as Àngel Guimerà (1845–1924) or Felip Pedrell (1841–1922), there is already a significant disparity in their dramatic-musical styles and conceptions. This is only further exacerbated when considering the temporal distance between the figures involved in the Catalan lyric movement and the seminal composer Richard Wagner, more than five decades older than Gual or Morera. Consequently, the presentation of imitation Wagnerian musical drama as modernizing, in chronological terms, could be contradictory.

Figure 113: Time line including the main Catalan authors involved in the lyric movement compared to the foreign authors that influenced the Modernist cultural renewal.

While there was an interest in contemporaneous creation regarding the French-speaking world, as evidenced by the translation into Catalan and staging of Maeterlinck's pieces shortly after their first premieres, regarding the German-speaking world this interest was focused on Wagner and the post-Wagnerian school, as demonstrated by the Catalan performance of Engelbert Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel (1893, premiered in Catalan in 1907 at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner).

However, German culture itself was undergoing a new phase of modernization with operas such as Salome (1905) or Elektra (1909) by Richard Strauss, whose premieres in Germany are parallel with the lyric activity of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner in Barcelona. Thus, within the German cultural landscape, there were new immediate references in the current avant-garde for which no such interest was shown. Hence, how does the figure of Wagner present himself as a reference point for modernization?

Adrià Gual himself acknowledges that Richard Wagner is a figure from the past, yet justifies his resonance in the present due to the late reception of his oeuvre:

> "[…] Wagner's name is no longer, and cannot be, for our generation a novelty or a surprise. Our awakening coincided with the arrival of the imposing echo of the Master's work, [...] we may not have received it, but we have rather found it on our way [...] On the same note, we speak of it as something admired and we cannot speak of it as something discovered[425]."

Although his operas began to arrive in Catalonia in the 1880s, new premieres were still taking place at the Gran Teatre del Liceu in 1899, such as Die Walküre (first performed in 1870 in Munich) and Tristan und Isolde (1865, Munich). It is worth noting the case of Parsifal, which, since its premiere in 1882, could not be performed outside Bayreuth until 1914 due to copyright restrictions[426]. Thus, the export of Wagner's work and its reception abroad spread over the decades, remaining as a current novelty.

It is in the early 20th century, when Wagner had already achieved a notable level of acclaim among the Barcelona public, when Adrià Gual recognized Wagner as a modernizing influence. Gual leveraged Wagner's popularity to advocate for cultural renewal, drawing inspiration from the Germanic model that Wagner embodied. However, it is crucial to acknowledge the continued relevance of Wagner's legacy in Germany during this period, primarily attributed to the continuity of the Bayreuth Festival and the role of Wagnerian musical drama in fostering a sense of German cultural unity, which was a significant component of nationalist ideology during that era[427].

The German nationalist movement provided a theoretical and ideological foundation for Catalan nationalism, as evidenced by the influence of German thinkers on the development of Prat de la Riba's nationalist theory[428]. In fact, when Gual examines the staging of Wagnerian drama in his texts, he does so by quoting the words of Houston Stewart Chamberlain[429], husband of Wagner's youngest daughter and a regular attendee at the Bayreuth Festival, who also stood out as a theorist of Pan-Germanist nationalism. Therefore, Wagner's reception transcends the realm of his artistic contributions. His theoretical reception is filtered by the perception of Wagner held by German intellectuals during that period, and by the symbolic instrumentalization of his figure as a nationalist reference point. It is precisely this nationalist fervor, which endured from Romanticism to Modernism, what worked as a connecting vessel, facilitating the transmission of interest in Wagner's figure between the two aesthetic movements.

This interest in Germanic culture on the part of Catalan nationalism is also evident in the staging of Germanic legends in multiple musical visions. Although the aim of the genre was to stage regional folklore in Catalan language, pieces such as La cova de les serps (premiered at the Mercè hall) were also written, with "a plot based on a Germanic legend and arranged into Catalan verses by Josep Carner[430]". Other examples could be the musical vision based on Montserrat's legend Fra Garí, arranged by Xavier Viura and Enric Morera, or the lyric-dramatic poem Gaziel by Apel·les Mestres and Enric Granados (Principal theater of Barcelona), which clearly are adaptations following the German legend of Faust.

[429] The only direct quotation that Adrià Gual paraphrases in his speeches on lyric theater is from Chamberlain's Das Drama Richard Wagners [The Wagnerian drama], which was originally published in 1892 and subsequently translated into Catalan by Joaquim Pena in 1902 as El drama wagnerià.
[430] La Veu de Catalunya 2498 (22/03/1906), evening edition, p. 4.

Other pieces were taken directly from German authors, such as the musical fragments by Robert Schumann that were used to accompany the tale of La Fustots [Cinderella], produced by Lluís Graner with an arrangement of the folk text made by Josep Carner, or the opera Hänsel und Gretel, which Engelbert Humperdinck (heir to the Wagnerian style) premiered in 1893 and which Lluís Graner would produce at the Principal theater of Barcelona. Actually, the Catalan premiere of Hänsel und Gretel, translated as Ton i Guida, was followed by a list of Catalan parodies and adaptations, remarking the rich reception of the piece and the interest that it entailed. For example, L'oració de la nit by Rafael Masó and Joaquim Pecanins, premiered at the Gerió hall, was a piece composed of "fresh and naïve verses, very heartfelt, inspired by a well-known German legend that has its counterparts in other countries[431]".

This legend was, in fact, Hänsel und Gretel, freely adapted following the Catholic moral, according to which the lost kids were rescued from the woods by an angel after saying their daily night prayer. Also, En Tonet i la Guideta, using the diminutive version of the characters' names, was premiered at the Saló Montserrat in Arenys de Mar as a "plastic comic-musical piece", with a libretto written by Francisco de Prats and a stage design made by F. Casanovas. "As we can deduce from the title, it is clear that this is a parody of Goethe's famous piece, which has been so successfully performed in Catalan under the title Ton i Guida[432]."

In Adrià Gual's own historical analysis[433], Wagner is regarded as the final link in a chain of German authors that includes Goethe and Schiller. Gual reviews the various moments and authors who have used legend and mythology as the foundation for their dramaturgy, from Greek antiquity, through Shakespeare, to German Romanticism, culminating in Richard Wagner.

Following Wagner's consideration as the heir to Greek tragedy, chant and word come together through legend to instruct the people in correct morality, since the businessmen and bourgeoisie, who possess the purchasing power to invest in culture, "are impassive when it comes to matters of art" and have corrupted the arts by seeking economic profit, thereby compromising artistic quality and morality. "That is to say, those who should be, for the good sake of art, its disseminators have turned out to be unnatural exploiters, self-declared obstacles[434]". These ideas had already been expressed by Nietzsche himself in Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik [The Birth of Tragedy Out of the Spirit of Music] (1872) and by Wagner in Die Kunst und die Revolution [Art and Revolution] (1849), thus highlighting the ideological concomitance within their respective discourses.

Cultural renewal through Germanism is presented as the saving solution to the perceived Mediterranean moral and aesthetic corruption. Always according to Gual, the reception of Richard Wagner's work in Catalonia represents the introduction of a new reference point from which Catalans could begin to distance themselves from the traditional influences that hindered the development of their desired national theater. The integration of Germanist ideals thus allowed for a deviation from the dominant genres of the time, which included French vaudeville and operetta, Italian opera, and Castilian zarzuela, characterized by their emphasis on humor and physical comedy, were often criticized for their lack of intellectual depth and their cultivation of "fanatics of melodicism", overly devoted to melodic appreciation without intellectual requirement[435].

Given the aforementioned references, German Romanticism emerges as the theatrical model of reference: from Shakespeare as the seed of 19th century drama[436] to Goethe, who "brings to life his great Doctor Faust from a legend of Vichnau (13th century)," and Wagner with his musical drama. The focus is, thus, on the idealized figure of Wagner and the Germanic world, as opposed to Italian opera and French operetta, both of which had been imitated in Spain in the mid-19th century reformulation of the zarzuela[437].

As Cortès considers, Wagner meant for Catalan nationalist ideology a model to follow in order to overcome Italian aesthetic clichés, and he was seen at the same time as a dignification of the operatic repertoire[438]. Following these considerations, Gual attempts to legitimize Catalan lyric theater by presenting it as a continuation of the musical drama developed in the German tradition: Mozart, Gluck, and Weber had paved the way for Wagner's genius, and by imitating him, Catalan lyric theater would place itself on his level[439].

However, this theoretical discourse shows certain public concessions to the Catalanist sector in favor of Wagner and of fully sung opera that do not entirely align with the practical projects Gual carries out. First, although Gual designs the stage sets for the production of Wagner's operas in Barcelona, he also collaborates in the importation of French comic opera and some Italian ones translated into Spanish. Between April and May 1905, when he was already involved in Lluís Graner's company based at the Mercè hall, Gual, together with Arturo Baratta, directed a brief season of Spanish-language opera at the Eldorado theater with the Compañía Lírica Internacional, presenting works by Offenbach, Bizet, and Gounod, and even Puccini's La bohème, as well as the premiere of a new Spanish opera, Inés de Castro, by Vicente Costa and Nogueras[440]. These titles openly contradicted his apprehension against Mediterranean melodic opera.

❖ Staging and practical results through the French filter

When we compare the general characteristics of a Wagnerian drama with those of a musical vision, we see quite a few differences. The influences on its dramaturgical conception and staging are, indeed, diverse, yet Wagnerian drama is practically the only one recognized in public discourse.

Wagnerian musical drama	Musical vision
3 acts and several hours of duration.	1 act made of 1 to 3 scenes, 20–30 min.
Dramaturgy based on narrative development of the action.	Suggestive scenes based on disjoined situations and little dramatic action.
Literary and elaborated dramatic texts.	Lyrics coming from glossed folk songs and legends, staying true to the original compiled version; childish character.
Based on the reelaboration of medieval mythology.	Based on the staging of folk songs and tales as they were recorded.
In the national language (German).	In the national language (Catalan).
Musical continuity without the division into separated musical numbers.	Alternation of spoken and sung parts, intentionally avoiding the contrast between them with instrumental transitions and spoken intonations.
Use of leitmotif (association of motifs with scenic elements through simultaneous appearance and repetition throughout the piece).	Each scene presents a musical motif that will be repeated and varied throughout the different sung moments.
Use of expanded harmony and large orchestral ensemble with emphasis on brass instruments.	Use of expanded harmony and small ensembles of between 3 and 5 instruments (with the exception of the Principal theater in Barcelona, which has a full orchestra).
Staging style based on mythological realism.	From the initial decadent Symbolism (Gual's Blancaflor) to vitalistic Symbolism (Graner's productions); suggestive use of lighting and color.

In formal and dramaturgical terms, the influence of Maeterlinck's Symbolist theater and the scenographic proposals developed by this French-speaking school are evident. The precedents of Nocturn and Blancaflor had already clearly demonstrated Maeterlinck's influence on Gual's own dramaturgy, practically imitating the Belgian playwright by adapting his Pelléas et Mélisande for his Nocturn[441].

Figure 5 (right):* Illustration by Carlos Schwabe for the edition of the play Pelléas et Mélisande (1892) by Maeterlinck. They both use the same purple color for the characters due to its symbolic meaning.

From the short format in one act, consisting of various scenes that present suggestive images without a narrative development of the action, to the scenographic conception with a strong medievalist timeless component and a very thoughtful use of lighting and color. All of this distances us from the original Wagnerian musical drama, since the idea of a total work of art passes through the filter of the Symbolist school, which adds its concern for scenographic visual and plastic detail.

In fact, Gual recognized the contribution of Wagnerian theory in terms of the union of music and text, emphasizing the intertwined nature of their meanings. Nevertheless, he regarded it as an unfinished conception, as the scenography must also be unified as an element that evokes the feeling of the scene:

> "Wagner's work, conceived with the intention of unifying all theatrical components, undeniably failed in terms of plastic stage design, practically at odds with the technical possibilities, as well as being of a dubious taste inherited from the race and the moment in which it was produced[442]".

Clear examples of this concern for the plastic staging could be the musical visions of La matinada, Montserrat, or L'Atlàntida, where the primary element driving the stage dramaturgy is colored electric lighting. Whether to recreate a sunrise, outline the mountains of Montserrat, or imitate the thunder and lightning of a storm, lighting is used as the central element of the piece without presenting any narrative development of the story, situation, origin, or internal evolution of the characters.

Indeed, in a letter addressed to Adrià Gual and published in El poble català, Manuel de Montoliu explicitly warns him that his lyrical conception errs succumbing to spiritualism because it has approached Maeterlinck too much. Instead, Montoliu argues, Gual should imitate Wagner in his literary development of legendary action:

> "[...] Maeterlinck's generous attempt to spiritualize modern theater beyond measure has proved fruitless [...] And as for the new lyrical-dramatic form [...] that you, my friend Gual, conceived in a moment of inspiration, great care must be taken to ensure that it does not become a hybrid genre [...] that distorts the poetic element of the legend on the one hand and is a veritable atrophy of lyrical drama on the other.
> This new genre must be [...] a glossed legend and a condensed drama, both elements intimately fused through music; in a word, a corollary of Wagner's musical drama[443]".

In other words, according to Montoliu, the genre devised by Gual is not Wagnerian because it does not adhere to the conventional narrative development of musical drama. This assertion is reiterated on numerous occasions in the Modernist journal Joventut, which specially addresses the form of the pieces, emphasizing the necessity of large-scale pieces comprising three acts.

This phenomenon can be attributed, at least in part, to the impact of the regional Catalan folklore movement. The material employed in the creation of the pieces is respected and it remains as it was obtained from the original source. This stands in contrast to the practices prevalent during the Romantic period and in Wagner's oeuvre, where the material was often subjected to extensive elaboration. Modernists, however, interpret the recorded folklore as the embodiment of the national spirit, a manifestation of national identity, and a subject worthy of preservation in its original state. Folk songs are simple, spontaneous expressions, without a premeditated ideological content, and they should be kept like this[444]. Consequently, they limit their engagement with folklore to mere glossing, refraining from any alteration or variation in its content.

A more direct affinity with Wagnerian musical drama is apparent in the realm of musical dramaturgy, where a certain similarity exists, though not a complete congruence. A prevailing concern linked to Wagnerian theories pertains to the use and reiteration of musical motifs, or leitmotifs. This tendency, however, is also attributable to the very nature of the Catalan lyric dramaturgy, which is founded on the glossing of folk songs, traditionally strophic, meaning that the theme or motif that characterizes them is also repeated in origin.

Pieces based on the staging of legends or tales that were not originally accompanied with any folk melodies will also employ the motif as a structuring musical element in each scene of the play. However, these will not reach the degree of narratological development of the Wagnerian leitmotif, since there is no prolonged action in which the motif can participate interrelating its meaning with other dramaturgical elements. Instead, the role of the music motifs will work as a technique to formally structure the music, avoiding traditional melodic arias and instrumental forms, allowing a fluid musical continuum based on the repetition and orchestral variation of the motifs. Instead of preventing the dramaturgical action or being linked to the evolution of characters, the role of music here will be rather suggestive of the folk tone of the story and simply descriptive of the nature of some evil or heavenly characters[445].

The employment of legend is also associated with Wagner, yet this correlation is not exclusive. Adrià Gual makes several assertions regarding Wagner's role as the zenith of the utilization of mythology in theater. However, there are also numerous references to the legend as a transnational and timeless element whose interpretation has been and continues to be given in different peoples: "We must not limit ourselves purely to our own legends. All legends are siblings and all are beautiful, and only with them and through them can men arrive at an understanding of human secrets[446]".

Even the fervent Wagnerian advocate Manuel de Montoliu acknowledged in the same aforementioned letter to Gual the universal nature of legend and its widespread use as a builder of national cultures:

> "We can say, in general, that the national theater of all countries is nothing more than the dramatization of their historical or legendary deeds [...]. Thus, all of us who have a keen interest in the formation of this national theater of our Catalonia, based on the songs and legends of antiquity, have no shortage of models from which to learn and draw inspiration. All times and all civilizations offer us something to choose from[447]".

Furthermore, researchers such as Bruce King and S. E. Wilmer assert that it is commonplace for urban modernism to draw on rural sources to legitimize its own identity[448] and for the construction of nationalist theatrical traditions to use national legend and mythology as a source of inspiration[449]. Consequently, it would be erroneous to assert that the employment of legend or mythology is inherently Wagnerian.

❖ The (inter)national value of mythology

The early 20th century saw European folk legends transformed into dynamic instruments of cultural exchange and ideological expression across national borders. For instance, Scandinavian myths were strategically adapted by German and British Romantic-nationalist movements, serving as cultural capital that either reinforced the idea of a shared ethno-cultural past or was politicized by nationalism[450]. This process mirrored broader European trends where ethnographers and folklorists systematically documented regional legends, not merely as nationalist projects but as contributions to an emerging transnational folklore network[451]. The Celtic Revival in Ireland, for instance, repackaged local legends for international consumption, while Slavic epics circulated through pan-Slavic intellectual circles.

Homi K. Bhabha's concept of cultural hybridity and the "third space[452]" helps explain how folk legends, when transmitted across borders, were not merely preserved but actively reinterpreted within diasporic and postcolonial contexts. These narratives became sites of negotiation where national identity was both asserted and destabilized through cross-cultural exchange. Benedict Anderson's theory of nations as "imagined communities[453]" further clarifies how folk legends, even when rooted in local tradition, gained international resonance when adopted by other societies, reinforcing pan-national identities or ideological affinities (e.g., pan-Slavism or pan-Africanism). These legends became portable patrimony, narratives that could simultaneously anchor local identity and travel across borders through academic journals, literary adaptations, and political movements.

Hence, early 20th century folk legends were far more than relics of rural tradition; they were dynamic mobile signifiers, politicized narratives that facilitated international solidarity, ideological mobilization, and even soft power. Whether through anticolonial resistance movements, diasporic cultural retention, or pan-national mythmaking, these stories functioned as both mirrors and engines of transnational identity formation.

In the realm of performing arts, the use of legends and myths as the foundation of the national theatrical tradition historically started in Germanic territories at the beginning of the 19th century and irradiated later on to the European surrounding nations. The cases of Boris Godunov in Russia (adapted to the theater by Aleksandr Puixkin in 1831 and arranged as an opera in 1874 by Modest Mussorgsky) or Peer Gynt in Norway (adapted to the theater by Ibsen in 1867 with incidental music by Edvard Grieg) are clear examples of the spread of this procedure.

As for their use to construct national traditions in the field of performing arts, S. E. Wilmer states that the use of traditional legends as a nationalizing technique in theater is a common element for the construction of nationalist theater traditions[454]. Bruce King also speaks of the adaptation of rural folklore, seen "as a source of authenticity", into mass culture as a common procedure in nationalist movements, especially "to overcome a modern sense of fragmentation and loss of identity[455]". These are exactly the precepts and intentions of the musical visions: to bring folk legends and songs to the city's stages to renew traditional culture and expand it among the urban audience.

Therefore, the use of legends as a basis for lyrical works is not an exclusively Germanic or Wagnerian characteristic. Musical visions could only be related to Wagnerism as a product of nationalist aesthetics and as a continuation of an initial synthesis of the arts that Wagner began. Nevertheless, Catalan Modernisme personalized this procedure of using mythology as the basis of national theater in the figure of Wagner.

The revindication of his figure has a quite symbolic value that overpasses the simple reference to Wagner's work and actually relates to transnational procedures of national construction through folkloric mythology. Richard Wagner abandoned and refused the Italian opera format after 1868's revolution that ended up with the German unification in 1871 and developed his own national genre based on Germanic mythology. Therefore, the musical drama that he developed meant: the refusal of external cultural influence, the revival of German culture through the use of its medieval folklore in his dramas, and the creation of a new genre of lyric theater that the German nation could identify as their own, culturally legitimating the nation in the present through their past. This was the exact same goal that the movement for a Catalan lyric theater had.

The Catalan folklorist movement, especially active between the 1880s and the 1920s, initiated the compilation of folkloric mythology to be the foundation of their new national culture, as Wagner had done with pieces such as Tristan and Isolde or The Ring of the Nibelung. The common interest in folk mythology as a way to construct national modern culture could be one of the reasons why Wagner was seen as a modernizing cultural influence in Modernist Catalonia.

The folklorist movement involved, as well, the birth of ethnomusicology with the compilation of folk songs from rural areas. For Catalan nationalism, the use of folk songs was one of the foundations of the new national culture, along with the aforementioned popular mythology. Folklorists and composers such as Higini Anglès and Pere Bohigas meticulously collected and standardized rural melodies from regions like Empordà and the Pyrenees, transforming them into symbols of Catalan identity. This process often involved suppressing Castilian influences and modern urban adaptations to present an "authentic" and timeless Catalan musical heritage, as seen in the Cançoner Popular de Catalunya project[456]. By selectively curating and homogenizing regional variants —such as the havaneres of the Costa Brava or the goigs of inland villages— collectors crafted a unified national repertoire that obscured the region's historical hybridity, including Moorish, French, and Castilian influences. This constructed authenticity resonated with the Renaixença cultural revival, Catalan Modernisme and the Noucentisme movement, which sought to define Catalonia's distinct identity within Spain.

However, although the folklorist movement is based on collection local rural folklore motivated by nationalist causes, it shares a transnational nature. This trend can be generally observed in the European peripheries and other regionalist movements, finding some of its main promoters in Béla Bartók (1881–1945, Hungarian), Jean Sibelius (1865–1957, Finnish) or Manuel de Falla (1876–1946, Spanish). This early 20th century wave of "musical nationalism" used folk song compilations, as Philip V. Bohlman's studies reveal, not as passive collections but active constructions of national identity, shaped by ideological agendas and transnational cultural flows.

European folklorists and composers selectively curated rural melodies, reframing them as eternal national symbols. This process often involved purging regional variations, foreign influences, or modernizing elements to fit a mythologized vision of cultural purity[457]. By erasing hybridity (e.g., the Romani roots of Spanish flamenco or the Slavic-Germanic blends in Austrian Volkslieder), collectors manufactured an "authenticity" that served nationalist movements, establishing an artificial divide between "pure" folk and "corrupt" urban or foreign music. For instance, Bartók's Hungarian collections excluded urban verbunkos styles to emphasize a pre-industrial "folk essence", while Cecil Sharp's English ballad editions standardized dialects to craft a cohesive national canon[458].

Therefore, with regard to folk songs, we can also speak of a transnational idea, whereby different nationalist movements across Europe considered them to be custodians of national identity. These movements parallelly underwent a process of selective compilation and stylization of folk songs to use them as one of the foundations of the new national culture, which interconnects the case of Catalan folklorism with the international European norm.

After analyzing the discourse and practical results in the configuration of musical visions as a Catalan lyrical genre, we find that Wagner's ideological and theoretical influence is present. However, it coexists with other influences with which it interferes and which have a more recognizable weight in the final result brought to the stage, such as Maeterlinckian Symbolism.

The treatment of the dramatic action, the short one-act format, and the scenographic conception bring the genre of musical visions closer to the Symbolist sphere. To such point, that it even provoked criticism from certain Catalanist sectors for being considered un-Wagnerian, despite the presence of ideas such as the "total work of art", the union of music and text, and the use of legend inherited from Wagner.

The Wagnerian precedent served to legitimize the genre internationally and historically, but the local tradition of folklore and workers' choirs, which based their repertoire on harmonizations of popular songs, was a much closer precedent. Wagner's influence helped consolidate Gual's proposal of staging folk songs, but it was not decisive or essential for its conception. The use of legend, as Catalan intellectuals of the time themselves recognized, was a transnational and timeless phenomenon, not exclusively Wagnerian.

Although it was not the most recent avant-gardist reference at the moment, the successful reception of Wagner's work during Catalan Modernisme served to introduce an alternative model to traditional Mediterranean influences. Wanting to break away from them, Wager became thus a renewing influence. He represented a different model of lyric theater, with more literary and dramaturgical weight and less melodic preponderance.

The value and force of Wagner's name in public discourse is symbolic, as an indisputable reference point for the construction of a national lyrical genre. The process that the Catalan lyrical theater movement wanted to carry out was the same as that which took place with the gestation and establishment of Wagnerian musical drama: the creation of a new genre in the national language without the influence of foreign styles. It would represent the national identity, historically legitimizing it with medieval references from local mythology that locate its origins centuries ago, and the nation would feel identified with it through the use of its traditional folklore and language.

Even though the final form and style of the musical vision genre differs from that of Wagnerian drama, the ideological goal that both processes present is similar enough to consider Wagner a role model of reference.

Chapter 6: A comparative perspective. Catalan and Lithuanian national awakenings through musical theater[459]

The need to include this chapter arises from the challenges we encounter when contextualizing our initial case of study, the movement for a Catalan lyric theater (1897–1923), within the broader musical theater scene of Spain. Closely linked to the Catalan national awakening of a sub-state, activist, and linguist nature, this movement sought to theorize and consolidate a national genre of Catalan musical theater to replace the foreign repertoire. In this process, the traditional external influences, such as Castilian, Italian, or French, were openly rejected in the search for a unique style or genre[460]. It was, as well, a means of articulating, spreading, and promoting the ideas and symbolic elements of Catalan nationalism to a mass audience.

This phenomenon of a sub-state nationalism rejecting centralist cultural influence diverged from the discourses and practices taking place elsewhere in Spain, where Madrid —the capital of the kingdom— centered the cultural focus. When historiography has attempted to construct a unified narrative of the situation, taking Madrid as the paradigm, Catalonia has often been interpreted as a case of self-inflicted isolation and disconnection from the international cultural scene: a negative byproduct of nationalism, rather than a contribution to a unified patriotism participating in the statal Spanish zarzuela circuit.

In the effort to shape a national genre in Catalonia, there was a strong emphasis on local folklore. Most artistic proposals emerging from this movement argued that works should incorporate sardanas (instead of the waltzes typical of imported operettas or other Spanish rhythms) and quotations from Catalan folk songs (many of which the authors themselves had collected from rural towns). Folk songs, passed from generation to generation by oral transmission, were seen as especially powerful symbols, thought to be tied to the land and to carry the essence of the towns where they had traditionally been sung[461]. Local legends, tales, and myths also become subjects for lyric theater plots, while local traditions and customs are often depicted too in operettas with a more comic tone. What we observe, then, is a process in which the staging of microregional folklore —songs, dances, and tales from highly specific areas— was used to construct a new "national culture" intended to represent Catalonia as a whole.

[459] The chapter is included as edited for its publication in: PÉREZ APARICIO, José Miguel (2025c): "National Awakenings Through Musical Theater: A Comparative Perspective Between the Catalan and Lithuanian Revivals". Lietuvos muzikologija 26, pp. 75–95.
The research took place during the international research stay at the Research Centre of the Lithuanian Music and Theater Academy (Vilnius) funded by the complementary grants for international mobility (EST24/00023) of the FPU doctoral fellowship awarded by the Ministry of Universities of Spain.
[460] In the case of the Lithuanian national revival, we can observe similar debates regarding the harmonization of folk songs, for example. Harmonizing Lithuanian folk songs using a style coming from Russian or German influence was not considered to be purely Lithuanian.
[461] BATLLE I JORDÀ, Carles (2001): Adrià Gual (1891–1902)..., op. cit., pp. 245–251.

One of the aims of this chapter is precisely to emphasize that this use of microregional folklore to articulate a differentiated national identity through its staging in musical theater was not unique to Catalonia. Rather, it was common practice across different regions undergoing similar processes of national awakening during the same period. These regions followed, independently, comparable patterns in the process of conceiving a new national culture and in determining what symbolic elements made it "national." By demonstrating this, we seek to "normalize" the case of Catalonia, which Spanish state historiography has often treated as a regional exception, and instead integrate it into a broader European context of nationalist awakenings.

Even if the events taking place in this region do not fit within the state dynamics occurring in the rest of Spain, especially those centered in the Castilian capital of Madrid, this movement should not be dismissed as an isolated case within its sociocultural environment. The aim of this chapter is to prove that this process of nation-building through an independently and newly created national culture was not unique to Catalonia but also to other sub-state nationalisms of the same period as part of a broader transnational practice.

The Catalan case study will be set in this chapter alongside another European region that experienced a coetaneous national awakening of similar characteristics, presenting a comparison based on transnational history methodologies. The goal is to determine whether, under the same ideological process of a sub-state national awakening, the discourses and practices of cultural nationalism used to mobilize society and establish a national culture in the field of musical theater were also similar, despite belonging to different geopolitical contexts and areas of artistic influence.

The chosen case for this comparison is Lithuania and its national revival at the beginning of the twentieth century, from 1904, when the use of the Lithuanian language was legalized, until the restoration of the independent state in 1918. Both are sub-state movements of ethno-linguistic character within imperial states in the process of national homogenization (Russification, Castilianization), with linguistic diglossia. Moreover, both processes of conceptualizing and implementing a new national culture can be studied independently, since their similarities cannot be attributed to reciprocal influence, given that each was located in a different part of Europe and without apparent direct links between them.

The decades of the 1920s and 1930s, in which the political trajectories of the two cases diverged, will also be considered. While Lithuania became independent, creating its own state and new national institutions, such as the State Theater, Spain entered the military and corporatist dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, which initiated the repression of non-Castilian regional identities and languages, including Catalan. This will allow us to see whether the new administrative structures generated notable changes in the actions and ideas of both nationalist movements.

Special attention will be paid to which symbolic elements were considered representative of national cultural identity, how they were introduced into musical theater, and what kind of dramatic genres or styles were employed. The hypothesis proposes that, although there are stylistic differences depending on regional traditions, artistic influences of the area, and the education of their authors, the ideological and theoretical processes taking place were similar. In addition, as a secondary underlying goal, this study seeks to provide a pluralistic view of the diversity of lyric formats and genres used during this period. While the historiography of music has focused mainly on constructing the histories of national operas due to the greater musical sophistication of this genre, this chapter highlights the importance of the "popular" genres of musical theater and the role they played in reinforcing feelings of national belonging reaching a broader social scope, especially through the active participation of amateur people in performances.

❖ Cases of sub-state nationalism and civic cultural activism

The case chosen for the comparison is the Lithuanian national revival that takes place during the first decades of the 20th century, beginning with the legalization of the Lithuanian language in 1904 and culminating in the reestablishment of the independent state in 1918. This case meets the previously mentioned requirements of a sub-state national awakening that was contemporaneous in time yet located in a different geopolitical context and cultural sphere of influence within Europe. We can therefore attempt a comparison based on their common similarities aiming to find shared patterns of cultural implementation of nationalist ideals.

Catalonia, for its part, it's a region that had been integrated into the Kingdom of Castile in 1714 after the War of Spanish Succession between Habsburg and Bourbon claimants to the throne. The memory of the Crown of Aragon and its independent institutions provided Catalanism with a historical legitimation for recovering autonomous governance. Between 1870 and 1890, the revindication of the cultural use of the Catalan language became increasingly public through the theatrical works of writers such as Jacint Verdaguer, Àngel Guimerà, and Narcís Oller.

It will be during the period of Catalan Modernisme, the regional variant of the international Art Nouveau movement spanning the 1890s to the early 1920s, when a strong cultural mobilization took place to create Catalan national styles in different fields of art. Musical theater became of particular importance, viewed as the "total art" uniting all disciplines[462]. Providing people with a repertoire of musical theater in Catalan so that they would not have to consume exclusively Spanish zarzuela, as well as modernizing Catalan rural folklore for performance in the cities, were central tasks for cultural activists in order to familiarize the population of industrial centers with Catalan language and folklore. The politization of the nationalist movement eventually achieved in 1914 the creation of the Commonwealth of Catalonia (Mancomunitat de Catalunya), the first administrative entity within the Kingdom of Spain that recognized the union of the four Catalan provinces until its dismantling in 1925 under the military dictatorship of Primo de Rivera.

Lithuania, meanwhile, had been a region of the Russian Empire since its annexation in 1795. Historically, however, it had been an independent duchy that, even if unified in the form of a commonwealth with the Kingdom of Poland under the Union of Lublin in 1569, had retained autonomous government and an official recognition as one of the two nations forming the unified state. However, during the nineteenth century, the imperial policies of Russification provoked rebellions in 1830 and 1863 that were responded with the closure of the University of Vilnius and the ban of the Lithuanian language. This ban prompted the book-smuggling movement, which kept the language alive until its decriminalization in 1904. The gatherings known as "Lithuanian evenings" also played an important role in sustaining the language alive[463]. Choir associations and amateur theater groups were also key in mobilizing society toward the promotion of a national culture. The staging of amateur operettas, as well as of mysteries and miracles symbolizing the rebirth of the nation through the staging of mythological folklore, was particularly significant in shaping a shared national consciousness[464]. In 1918, Lithuania's independence was reestablished in the context of the Russian Revolution and World War I.

Both are therefore cases of sub-state nationalism: regions integrated into larger imperial states that developed nationalist cultural awakenings at odds with the national identity that the imperial states sought to homogenize[465]. Catalan nationalism opposed Spanish identity, while Lithuanian nationalism opposed Russian and Polish identities. Both were mainly based on shared linguistic and cultural traits —their own national languages and common folklore that are specific to their regions— as well as in historical memories of independence, with their own legal and nobiliary structures that legitimized the recovery of autonomy[466]. Yet, as noted earlier, both movements also displayed traits of civic nationalism through the activist will to mobilize and structure civil associations to promote and establish a new national culture.

Being language one of the main defining elements of national identity, a shared characteristic of both societies was linguistic diglossia and the class connotations attached to language use. There is a process of substitution of Catalan and Lithuanian languages, displaced by the main "languages of culture", reducing them to "peasant languages" with decreasing urban and administrative presence. In Catalonia, Spanish was promoted in education by the state, and used by elites, while in Lithuania, Polish (spoken by the aristocracy and clergy due to past ties with the Polish kingdom) and Russian (dominant in the Tsarist institutions in the capital of Vilnius) prevailed. Whether these restrictions were more or less severe[467], in both cases they had direct effects on cultural offerings: the theaters in Catalonia were filled with Spanish zarzuelas and touring Spanish companies[468], while in Lithuania theaters hosted Polish drama companies and Russian opera and operetta troupes[469], staging opera exclusively in the Russian language[470]. In both cases, the Catalan and Lithuanian languages were relegated to folk and amateur culture and rural environments.

For both nationalist movements, folk songs became one of the central symbols of national culture. Folk songs were artistic, included lyrics in the national language, and embodied orally transmitted traditions handed down generationally over centuries and legitimized by history. As understood by Adrià Gual, folk songs are "a work of art that is flower of our land", tied to our childhood memory:

> "When we remember those times, sleepy songs come to our mind, that, with the ear of a child, still pure before the distressing sounds of life, we picked up straight from the lips of a loving mother, to the rhythm of a swinging crib […] Those melodies […] now come to us as intimate friends […] calling to the deepest of our souls[471]".

For Stasys Šimkus:

> "[…] our cultural and national rise was particularly related to the song. It is difficult to analyze today whether there was more aesthetic admiration, or a patriotic feeling, or a desire to resurrect the nation everything together, because music, and especially a beautiful song, which brings pure aesthetic joy, also touches and awakens the noble desires of the soul[472]".

Choirs and theater groups became the principal vehicles for congregating people and making them engage on tasks of cultural divulgation. The harmonization of folk songs was especially prolific, fueling strong choral movements in the two studied regions closely tied to the spread of their national revivals. As M. K. Čiurlionis observed:

[467] A ban on Lithuanian language was enforced in 1865 by the Russian empire. It was prosecuted until 1904, eventually becoming the official language of the new state in 1918.
In Catalonia, the opposite was the case. Although Spanish was promoted by the state and compulsory in education, Catalan language had been widely used until then. It is in 1922 when it's administrative limitation and prosecution started under the regime of Primo de Rivera.

[…] Those songs are precious marble rocks waiting only for a genius, who will know how to make immortal works from them[473]".

National awakenings in both regions involved intense efforts through the decades to compile folk songs collected from peasants, harmonize them for choral performance, and eventually stage them in musical theater[474].

As to who led these movements and how, attention must be paid to a common phenomenon in the formation of national intellectual elites. These awakenings were led not by the traditional nobility but by a new class of intellectuals coming from a popular background. This was significant in that they were in direct contact either with rural communities that preserved folk traditions and songs or with workers and popular classes whom they envisioned as the audiences for their new national cultures.

In Catalonia, composer Enric Morera (1865–1942) was the main promoter of amateur choirs and seasons of musical theater in Catalan, while painter/writer Adrià Gual (1872–1943) led multiple theater companies dedicated to Catalan repertoire. Morera came from a family of musicians who had migrated to Buenos Aires, earning a living through teaching and playing in theaters and cafés. He later returned to Barcelona to learn from private teachers that he paid with his own savings, without officially enrolling in any conservatory. Gual, for his side, was the son of an artisan lithographer from Reus and studied painting also privately at the academy of Pere Borrell.

In the case of the Lithuanian revival, figures that stand out are composer Mikas Petrauskas (1873–1937), who took on the wide pedagogical task of promoting the opening of Lithuanian music schools and choirs, and composer and painter M. K. Čiurlionis (1875–1911), who carried out a relevant task in the promotion of Lithuanian painting organizing the Exhibitions of Lithuanian Art. He also developed theories about Lithuanian music, which he published alongside the literary critical chapter of his wife Sofija Kymantaitė-Čiurlionienė in the book Lietuvoje [In Lithuania] (1910).

Both Petrauskas and Čiurlionis were the sons of church organists in small towns: Petrauskas was born in Palūšė and worked in the churches of Labanoras and Obeliai as a teenager, while Čiurlionis grew up between Senoji Varėna and Druskininkai. The two of them learned music from their fathers, eventually attending music school and studying at conservatories abroad.

The concept of the "popular" or "folk" was central to all of them when addressing the building of a national culture, from Mikas Petrauskas's "liaudies opera" ("folk opera") to Adrià Gual's "cançó popular harmonitzada per a l'escena" ("folk song harmonized for the stage"). However, it presents different significations in their discourses. For some, "popular" meant creating a national culture for consumption by the popular classes that conformed the nation, a vision promoted by Morera and Petrauskas with their operetta repertoire. For others, "popular" meant grounding intellectual national culture in folk traditions, as pursued by Gual and Čiurlionis, and exemplified in the repertoire of symbolistic lyric theater.

Folk songs were, indeed, a key element of the national imagery. Either quotations of folk songs were woven into new pieces, or the vocal style of compositions imitated the folk intonations and rhythms. In Catalonia, musical visions such as Blancaflor (1899) by Enric Granados and La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida] (1905) by Jaume Pahissa, both with lyrics arranged and glossed by Adrià Gual, took as their basis the harmonization and orchestration of homonymous folk songs, using the original lyrics as the plot for full dramatic pieces[475]. In Lithuania, Petrauskas's opera Eglė—žalčių karalienė [Eglė, Queen of Snakes] (1924) used archaic modes and folk melodic intonations[476], while J. Karnavičius's Gražina (1933) incorporated more than 40 folk song quotations[477].

Another shared trait was the personal commitment of nationalist authors and artists, whose activist dedication to the building of a national culture led the civil mobilization required to settle choirs and drama companies, financing many from their own pockets despite knowing they would not recover the investment. It's worth mentioning how Enric Morera destined his personal savings to produce the seasons of Teatre Líric Català that he directed in 1900[478] and 1922[479], and how Lluís Graner invested his personal fortune in the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, which staged high-quality productions of musical visions between 1905 and 1908 with affordable-price tickets for the lower classes[480]. Petrauskas similarly financed the printing of his operetta scores to distribute them to choirs he had helped to establish to provide them with repertoire to stage:

> "If I print Kaminakrėtys, I will send it to Saint Petersburg to Sapir. […] I doubt very much that Kaminakrėtys would return the investment after printing, because there will be few people who demand it. Well, I'll have to think about that. If there was money, I would print all my works regardless of anything, but the money is like swept away. It's true, I gave a concert in Chicago, the concert brought in 400 dollars, but I haven't had it for a long time[481]".

They were aware that such investments would not be recovered, since it was not a profitable business. However, they were not commercially motivated but pursued cultural and symbolic goals.

Private initiatives to gather amateur theater groups demonstrate the activist dedication of the nationalist cultural sector. One example is Gabrielius Landsbergis-Žemkalnis's staging of Mindaugas, Lietuvos Karalius [Mindaugas, King of Lithuania] (1908), which directly competed with professional Polish companies presenting the same piece at the same time[482]. Another is the secret staging of Birutė in 1906, written by the same Landsbergis-Žemkalnis after his imprisonment for "Lithuanian propaganda", with music by Petrauskas, who was then being sought by Tsarist authorities for arrest[483]. Similarly, the efforts of the Lithuanian Artists' Society to stage La traviata in Kaunas in 1920, under extremely precarious postwar circumstances, marked the beginning of Lithuanian opera[484]. This act of perseverance works as a paradigm of the promoters' personal commitment, carried out as an expression of national cultural consciousness, regardless of the economic outcome.

On the Catalan stage, we also find notable initiatives led by actors. In 1910, the Borràs brothers —actors from the Principal theater company— rented the venue themselves to restore the Catalan repertoire after its previous director had shifted to Spanish-language theater in search of greater profit, while Assumpció Paricio and Artur Balot created their own traveling company for the 1915–16 season to perform Catalan musical theater when no theater empresario would permanently host them.

The fact that the actors and singers were amateurs demonstrates that this was a movement of strong civil mobilization, with ordinary people actively coordinating their efforts to consolidate a national culture. In venues such as the Sala Mercè in Barcelona, the Saló Gerió in Girona, and Ars-Lucis in Terrassa, as well as in plenty of other salons staging musical visions between 1904 and 1912 across Catalonia, all of the companies were formed by amateurs. Some later joined the professional stage, while others were simply motivated neighbors of their cities. From a methodological perspective, it is important to consider the actions of these lower and middle layers of society and how they perceived and experienced the national awakening in everyday life (what has been termed "banal nationalism[485]"). Traditional studies, by contrast, have tended to rely exclusively on the testimonies of the intellectual and political elite and well-documented institutions, generating a biased view[486].

Closely linked to the engagement of amateurs in stage productions was the constant pedagogical intention to instruct the people of the nation, both performers and audiences. Writing about the birth in 1907 of the choir Birutė, based in Chicago, Petrauskas stated:

> "I taught music for about 25 years, I spent money and worked to acquire knowledge that is necessary for such a profession and what is necessary for the education of people[487]".

Indeed, in the Lithuanian context, Mikas Petrauskas led the way in establishing choral societies and Lithuanian conservatories in the USA, so the diaspora could have better trained performers[488]. The more educated Lithuanian singers and musicians became, the better performances they could present at Lithuanian gatherings, thus keeping the community engaged and providing them with better artistic standards. As Petrauskas stated himself:

> "My desire after coming to the USA was, and still is, to educate as many people as possible in music, so that when I leave here, they can lead choirs and small orchestras on their own, so that they all remember that Petrauskas, while living in America, did not sleep, but worked for the Lithuanian nation...[489]".

Children were also a central focus. Petrauskas personally visited schools to audition young singers who would perform in his operettas[490]. Some operettas, such as Tarnaitė pamokė [The maid has taught] by Petrauskas or Musmirės [Amanita mushrooms] and Kur tiesa? [Where's the truth?] by Antanas Pocius, were written specifically to include children on stage, which, as Petrauskaitė notes, was "a memorable lesson in music and nationalism for them[491]". Pieces such as Girių karalius [The King of the Forest] were also aimed at young audiences.

In Catalonia, similar efforts can be observed. Enric Morera founded the choir Catalunya Nova, composed of motivated workers on a socialist mission to educate the lower classes on their musical abilities. As Morera recalls in his autobiography, members were so committed that they were even willing to walk to Paris to attend concerts when unable to pay for travel expenses[492]. The Foment del Teatre Líric Català association established a school of musical theater in 1903, offering free lessons in singing, declamation, and music reading to promote the consolidation of trained Catalan companies. The Mercè hall staged musical visions performed mainly by children[493], awakening in some of them the desire to pursue professional careers in Catalan musical theater. Similarly, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner in Barcelona held special sessions on Thursdays with discounts and toy raffles to attract the younger audiences to their "musical visions".

It is also relevant to note the open rejection of established institutions and the determination to create new ones through coordination between nationalist authors, intellectuals, and amateurs. Sofija Kymantaitė-Čiurlionienė summarized this idea in Lietuvoje: "[…] it is not institutions who make culture, but cultural people who make cultural institutions for themselves […][494]". The intention was not to take over the existing institutions and convert them to Lithuanian enterprises from within, but to create their own new ones: new companies, choirs, and theaters born of national consciousness and controlled directly by them, thus keeping them accessible and free of institutional or bureaucratic barriers.

In both cases, the institutionalized opera houses presented obstacles for composers seeking to premiere new pieces, whereas smaller halls and amateur companies proved to be more flexible options for premiering the new national repertoire. However, for present-day research, stable institutions with regular seasons such as opera theaters are easier to document than individual amateur performances without stable frequency, which left fewer traces in the press and less archival material, often relegating them to oblivion.

❖ The national genre(s): a pluralistic approach

There was never only one way of conceiving the new "national genre." Just as nationalist movements were politically and socially plural and diverse, so too were the cultural forms they consumed. Different social classes, political ideologies, and even (non-)religious orientations engaged with and promoted different kinds of genres and styles within the spectrum of the new national culture. In this sense, we can argue that the differences among proposals were not only based on artistic criteria, but also on the kind of audience they aimed to reach, the ideals they sought to transmit, and their own conception of what constituted national identity and how it had to be portrayed.

Examining both the Catalan and Lithuanian national revivals, we can classify the production of musical theater into three main groups: popular operetta, symbolistic and mythological lyric theater, and opera. Each offered a different aesthetic and dramaturgical approach and circulated within its own distribution networks, though in some cases the same authors contributed across multiple genres.

A notable multidisciplinary example from the Lithuanian scene is Jonas Dambrauskas, who simultaneously worked at the State Opera —where he reorchestrated Petrauskas's opera Eglė—žalčių karalienė in 1939— composed his own operas (Valdovas [The ruler], libretto by Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas, and Živilė, libretto by Jonas Graičiūnas), wrote music for theatrical dramas (such as Baisioji naktis [The frightful night, 1936, text by B. Sruoga] and Dvylika brolių juodvarniais laksčiusių [Twelve brothers flying like ravens, 1932, text by S. Kymantaitė-Čiurlionienė]), and composed for symbolist and mythological mysteries (Nuvainikuota Vaidilutė [Uncrowned Priestess, 1927], Amžių karžygys [The Warrior of Centuries, 1930], and Mūsų aukuras [Our pagan altar, 1937])[495]. Stasys Šimkus likewise ranged widely, from the operetta Išeivis [The expatriate] (1921), to the musical tragedy Čigonai [Gypsies] (ca. 1935), to the opera Kaimas prie dvaro [Village by the manor] (1941).

In Catalonia, Enric Morera was one of the most prolific composers, working indistinctively across operetta (such as L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by], 1898, and La reina del cor [The queen of the heart], 1901), symbolistic musical visions (like E*l comte l'Arnau* [The Count Arnau], 1905), lyric drama (the successful La santa espina [The holy thorn], 1907, to the later Don Joan de Serrallonga, 1922), and opera (from La fada [The fairy], 1897 to the late Tassarba, 1916)[496]. Jaume Pahissa also began with musical visions and later moved into large-format opera, even reworking earlier pieces into operatic form, such as La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida] (1905) into La princesa Margarida [Princess Margaret] (1928). Joan B. Lambert followed a similar trajectory, starting his career with musical visions (La mare de Déu [The Mother of God], 1904; Lo captiveri d'un sant [A saint's captivity], 1912), while also being closely involved with the management of the company, and eventually turned toward popular Castilian zarzuela (Por una mujer [For a woman], 1922).

These examples reinforce the connections among genres and demonstrate that they should not be analyzed as separate histories but as interconnected strands within a shared musical theater movement. Rather than adopting an evolutionist perspective that moves from simple operetta to large-format opera, it is more appropriate to view the different genres of musical theater as coexisting repertoires that addressed different cultural needs and appealed to different audiences. Even when opera was achieved, other genres were not abandoned, and composers continued to diversify their repertoire. In the following pages, we will examine each of these three categories individually in more detail.

- Popular operetta

The largest repertoire in the national language of both movements became operetta. Hundreds of titles were staged, involving dozens of companies and, significantly, amateurs actively participating in productions. This reflected not only the popularity of the genre but also a civic will to promote a form of national culture addressed to the popular classes.

Operetta required very little in the way of technical resources. Any group could take a text and stage a performance without needing to rent large theaters or assemble full orchestras. The pieces typically included songs that were short and easy to perform, sometimes requiring only voices or a small ensemble rather than a full orchestra. As a result, the genre was not dependent on higher institutions to host it; any stage or salon provided an adequate setting for amateur groups. This allowed for wide geographical diffusion. While in Catalonia the repertoire was mainly premiered on the motherland, with some exceptions arriving to the diaspora communities in America, the Lithuanian repertoire was mainly staged abroad.

A paradigmatic case is L'alegria que passa by Enric Morera and Santiago Rusiñol. This short piece for full orchestra, remained in repertoire for more than 25 years in various Barcelona professional theaters. Morera also arranged it for band, so it could be performed by smaller ensembles, and published a reduction for voice and piano. The piece was staged in more than fifty municipalities across Catalonia by amateur or semi-professional groups, in small salons or even in open-air squares. The main centers of Catalan diaspora in America also arranged performances of L'alegria que passa in Havana (Cuba), Santiago (Chile), Buenos Aires (Argentina) and Asunción (Paraguay).

Popular operettas typically depicted scenes of traditional life in comic and entertaining ways with simple plots that were easy to follow. Their humor often included jokes and vocabulary considered vulgar, prompting criticisms of their "low intellectual" level. For example, La sardana dels promesos [The sardana of engaged couples] by Josep Morató and Adrià Esquerrà is based on jealousies surrounding the local tradition of a rural town of pairing engaged young couples to dance the sardana in the town square. La dida seca [The dry nurse] by Eduard Aulés and Carles Oró, depicts under a comic tone the harsh rural economic reality: a man raising two children alone after the death of his wife, who was their wet nurse, while their parents served as soldiers in the American colonies—the children turning out as rude and foulmouthed as the rest of the men from the local tavern. Or Les roselles [The poppies] by Josep Maria Jordà and Adrià Esquerrà, a romantic comedy of misunderstandings, set against the religious tradition of leaving poppies in front of a statue of the Virgin Mary on an altar.

Authorial originality was often of little concern. Many works were translations or re-arrangements of other pieces under new titles, or re-used musical numbers from existing pieces, alongside well-known folk songs. The first operettas by Mikas Petrauskas were translations themselves, such as Kaminkrėtys ir malūnininkas (based on Jan Nepomucen Kamiński's Polish libretto Kominiarz i młynarz czyli Zawalenie się wieży) and Adomas ir Ieva (based on Ernest Blum and Raoul Toché's French libretto Adam et Eve)[497].

Pijus Bukšnaitis also stands out in the field of translation, publishing operettas such as Kornevilio varpai (a Lithuanized version of Charles Clairville's original Les cloches de Corneville), Gražioji Galatėja (arranging Franz von Suppe's melodies from Die schöne Galathée for choir), and Grigutis (adaptated from M. P. Starickio's Ukranian drama Oj ne chody Hryciu). Some pieces, instead of new music, took musical numbers from other preexisting titles, such as Kova už idėjas [Battle for ideas] (also translated by Bukšnaitis from Ukrainian) or Kanklininkas [Kanklės player] (combining folk songs and music from diverse operettas, with text by J. Steponaitis).

On the Catalan stage, translations of French comedies were also common, though plots and names were always changed and adapted to the Catalan context, and the titles of the original versions were usually unacknowledged. Lluís Puiggarí was one of the most active literary re-arrangers, publishing titles such as Permeti'm! [Allow me!], L'ajudant [The helper], and T'estimo! [I love you!]. While the texts were adapted, the music was always original, composed by Catalan authors both to suit local tastes and because importing foreign scores was expensive. In some cases, like Com unes malves [Like mallows], the same text circulated in both Spanish and Catalan previous versions. The press sometimes criticized the abusive practice of translations and rearrangements, with authors like Eduard Aulés known for recycling his own texts by doing not much more than just changing the title and adding a couple of musical numbers.

In Lithuania, other genres —especially mysteries and opera— resulted more attractive for the public during the interwar period, while operetta retained great popularity among migrant communities, particularly Lithuanian diaspora in the United States of America[498], as well as among Lithuanian workers that had moved to neighbor industrialized areas such as Riga and Saint Petersburg[499].

According to Petrauskaitė's analysis of more than 110 Lithuanian operettas produced between 1901 and 1940 in the US, roughly 65 presented generic topics not directly tied to Lithuanian national identity, while 25 had explicitly national plots portraying Lithuanian heroes or settings. The remainder included fairy-tales, mythological, religious, educational, or revolutionary themes[500]. However, these operetta gatherings were of special interest to reunite Lithuanians, allowing them to speak their native language, remember their origins, and be reminded of their traditional customs, awakening in them a national feeling and a sense of belonging to the Lithuanian nation in an environment of entertainment and celebration.

Mikas Petrauskas was the initiator and leading author of the genre. His operettas circulated widely, mainly among Lithuanian diaspora communities in the United States but also arriving to certain towns and cities across Lithuania. His 1903 arrangement of Kaminkrėtys ir malūnininkas [The chimneysweeper and the miller] for a Lithuanian society abroad was restaged in Lithuania in 1905, followed by Adomas ir Ieva [Adam and Eve]. However, out of the 110 titles identified by Petrauskaitė, only 15 are signed by Petrauskas, which indicated the broader involvement of other Lithuanian authors.

Kaminkrėtys ir malūnininkas was also staged, citing some examples, in Brooklyn in 1907, in Radviliškis in 1913, in Šiauliai in 1913 and 1938, in Chicago in 1918 and again in 1934, in Philadelphia in 1927 and 1933, in Baltimore and Worcester in 1939, and in New York from 1938 to 1940, becoming one of the most performed Lithuanian operettas. Another title written by Petrauskas, Consilium facultatis, which he edited in 1915, was staged in Klaipėda by the Singing Society, followed by a production of Birutė[501]. Also Vaikas ar mergaitė? [A boy or a girl?] appeared on the stage of the State Theater in Kaunas along with Birutė in 1925.

Although most of the documented performances of Lithuanian operetta took place abroad, there's also evidence of local initiatives in Lithuanian lands. The Dainos Society in Panevėžys was particularly active, staging Petrauskas's Adomas ir Ieva and Consilium facultatis in 1915. Even one of the local amateur performers, Vladas Paulauskas, wrote his own version of Kaminkrėtys ir malūnininkas in 1913. Into the 1920s, this society remained active staging operettas, as seen in their 1926 performance of Kornevilio varpai [The bells of Corneville].

In Catalonia, the Catalan Lyric Theater company, directed by Enric Morera and Ignasi Iglésias in 1900, was one of the highlights. Morera sought to create a series of Catalan operettas that companies in the region could stage in place of Castilian zarzuela, which also was quite popular across Catalonia. While the project failed to maintain a stable company or theater that hosted Catalan operetta, numerous sporadic short seasons of Catalan operetta were mounted between 1901 and 1923, many of them in provincial theaters, temporarily replacing predominant Spanish titles. Morera invested considerable effort, time, and personal funds as an impresario commissioning and producing new works, since the lack of a broad repertoire was the main problem for existing companies that could potentially stage Catalan operettas. However, despite his dedication, the initiative remained discontinuous and didn't manage to establish a permanent institution[502].

Cultural centers and associations across the geography of Catalonia frequently hosted amateur groups performing Catalan zarzuelas, as the works were both entertaining for the public in smaller towns and easy to perform. For intellectuals, however, the term "zarzuela" was directly associated with Castilian identity, proclaimed to be the "Spanish national genre" of musical theater. Nationalist intellectuals, therefore, avoided the term, preferring "operetta" or "lyric theater" to differentiate themselves from Spanish culture. Yet, the general public, press, and amateurs commonly referred to this repertoire of Catalan operettas as "Catalan zarzuelas", without attaching political meaning[503].

[502] AVIÑOA, Xosé (1985b): La música i el modernisme..., op. cit., pp. 287–311; 324–328.

[503] The repertoire of Catalan zarzuela, however, has barely been studied by contemporary musicology and theater studies. The low literary quality of the texts and the simplicity of the music are key factors in this lack of interest. Still, for contemporary Catalanism, the fact that one of the most widespread genres carried

These pieces played an important role by offering middle- and working-class audiences appealing repertoire in their own language, making them reflect on the cultural value of the customs and traditions of their daily life that they were watching performed on stage, nurturing a collective sense of national belonging. The fact that they were performed primarily by amateur groups is also relevant: their active participation demonstrated civic commitment to creating and sustaining a new national culture. Rather than passively consuming their language, folk songs, and dances, people were actively learning and performing them —a particularly meaningful process for migrant or mixed communities.

Thus, it was a relevant repertoire for nationalist activists to cultivate, serving two main purposes: first, to promote the cultural education of the lower classes in a field of their interest; and, second, to spread the elements that built national consciousness and a sense of national belonging. In the context of nationalist awakenings, bringing the broader population —including the working classes— to your side was essential for a successful establishment of the national project.

- Symbolist and mythological lyric theater

Another field to highlight comprises genres with different labels that are not straightforward to group but can be understood collectively as symbolist and mythological lyric theater. This trend brings together works that share a symbolist dramaturgy featuring medievalist aesthetics, mythological and folkloric references that evoke a glorious historical past, and an artistic combination of visuals, music, and poetic text (as an heir to the "total work of art"). It is strongly influenced by the modernist trends of Maeterlinck's symbolism and the Théâtre d'Art, in both its Parisian and Muscovite branches.

The aim is to create a highly artistic theater grounded in national folklore. The language tends to be poetic and suggestive rather than narrative. Dramaturgy is based on eliciting feelings and emotions through the different senses that theater can mobilize (music, visual staging, and poetic language), seeking to arouse an irrational response in the spectator while rejecting naturalist dramaturgies based on logical narratives and audience reasoning. Because national belonging and patriotism are felt as irrational rather than logical, the public should be addressed through emotion[504].

Moreover, medievalist and folkloric elements held strong symbolic value because they: 1) portrayed Catalan medieval institutions and nobility, recalling an independent past; 2) used an archaic Catalan language, legitimating the existence of their tongue across time; the name "zarzuela", with the correlation this implies with Castilian culture, is problematic. The few studies of "Catalan zarzuela" have instead focused on the intellectual initiatives that Catalanism undertook to distance itself from the genre, overlooking the fact that a wide repertoire of local zarzuela was being written for amateur stages in the Catalan language.

[504] GUAL, Adrià (1901): "El Teatre Popular...", op. cit.

3) divulgated tales and legends that strengthened a common cultural imagery for the nation based on rural folklore. These three elements were, in fact, the pillars on which political nationalist theories were built to legitimate the existence of their nationality.

Beyond its artistic interest, symbolism is closely linked to spiritualism and religious feelings; suggestive dramaturgies are especially apt for evoking the spiritual. In Catalonia, the musical visions received strong support from Catholic associations and leading figures from the regional church, while in Lithuania the staging of miracles and mysteries was often promoted by the Catholic Futurist (Ateitininkai) association[505]. Catalan repertoire directly staged episodes from the Bible or legends of miracles performed by Catholic saints (conservatives and traditionalists claimed Catalan identity was intrinsically Catholic and thus part of national folklore). Lithuanian repertoire, while less directly linked to the church, often included spiritual content in a broader sense, such as priestesses and rituals or visual references to the crucified Christ.

In the Catalan region, the repertoire corresponding to this category is the "musical visions." The first attempt to establish the genre occurred in 1898 with Blancaflor, a "harmonized folk song for the scene" by Adrià Gual, who commissioned the music from his friend Enric Granados. Gual theorized that folk songs —the most pure and innocent elements of traditional culture—, most intrinsically represented the national identity because of the generational oral transmission of the melodies, closely bound to the land where they were sung, and their moral and educational content. National culture, then, had to be based on staging folk songs. Although it was initially a failure, the theory was later taken up by the impressionist painter Lluís Graner, who added a layer of visual spectacular to folk stagings—electric and colorful light effects, fireworks, animals on stage, etc. The goal was to modernize folk culture to attractive urban audiences and, through theater, to restore the lost generational transmission of this rural folklore.

A circuit of small recreational salons opened across Catalonia, performing musical visions alongside movie projections or artistic installations. From the southern cities of [505] TRINKŪNAITĖ, Šarūnė (2017): "Stebuklinė Lietuva…", op. cit., p. 98.

Reus and Tarragona, to Terrassa, Manresa, Arenys de Mar, and in the north, Girona, an active network of salons staged musical visions across the whole region between 1904 and 1912. Many of the artistic directors and impresarios were, in fact, impressionist painters such as Lluís Graner, Joaquim Vancells, Adrià Gual, or figures from the plastic arts, such as architect Rafael Masó. Their interest in "painting the light", too limited by oil paint on canvas, led them to experiment with electric light in live performance, playing with shadow, color, and intensity on stage, making them some of the first lighting designers for the theater.

La matinada [The sunrise], conceived by Graner and commissioned from Adrià Gual and Felip Pedrell, is a paradigmatic example of this fusion of modernism and traditional values. The main dramaturgical element that leads the action is electric light. Set in a single scene—a landscape of the rural nature with a forest and a river—the piece begins in complete darkness and, as the sun rises, welcoming the new day, the lighting intensifies. A hidden choir of peasants thanks the sun for giving them a new day and with God for giving them the purifying mission of working the land. A flock of lambs (a clear religious symbol) cross the stage with the peasants, who dance a sardana, the national folk dance. This mixture of folk symbols of national identity, religious references, and the purity of idealized nature and the rural world —presented in a suggestive scene aimed at triggering the audience's emotions— paradigmatically exemplifies the dramaturgy of this kind of symbolist lyric theater.

The genre peaked at the Principal theater of Barcelona, when Lluís Graner installed his enterprise Espectacles-Audicions Graner in 1905. Alongside musical visions, the program offered concerts and dramas translated into Catalan with the purpose of showing both international classics and the most modern foreign trends on a pedagogical mission to present them to Catalan audiences. Graner's commitment to the highest artistic standards, however, generated deficits even in his most successful productions, and he eventually went bankrupt. After his exile to America to avoid debts, the circuit of salons that performed musical visions gradually closed their doors; outside of Barcelona, the general public of smaller cities and towns was not yet ready for such lyrical, symbolist repertoire. Some of the most famous productions were, as mentioned throughout this chapter, El comte l'Arnau and La presó de Lleida at the Principal theater, La mare de Déu at the Sala Mercè and L'oració de la nit at the Saló Gerió in Girona, later performed by children at several schools in this northern region.

A further view of their theoretical standpoint was the internationality of folklore. Local folklore was considered the purest representation of national identity, yet nationalists were aware that legends and songs often had similar versions in other lands. Folklore was thus simultaneously national and international —rooted in local regional identity yet connecting with other nations universally:

> "We don't have to only remain on our own legends. All of them are siblings and beautiful, and only from them and for them can mankind comprehend the human secrets[506]."

[506] GUAL, Adrià (1901): "El Teatre Popular...", op. cit.

In this sense, note the resemblance between the staging of La dona d'aigua [Aloja] (literally translated as "water-woman", also known abroad as undine), a musical vision produced at the Sala Mercè based on a Catalan mythological figure parallel of the Lithuanian Jūratė, with the sketched underwater world that Čiurlionis envisioned for the scenography of his unfinished symbolist opera.

In Lithuania, the initiator of symbolist theater was Vydūnas. Rejecting naturalism, his work is crafted not around a literary narrative but a combination of poetic text, gesture, and action to produce an emotional effect. He conceived theater as a return to spiritual ritual presenting deep philosophical reflections through complex metaphors, symbols, and suggestion. In line with the "total art" premise of symbolist dramaturgy, his language interweaves text with visual scenography and lighting, as well as the acoustic features of speech, music, and sound to create meaning[507].

His first operatic project —folk tale Gilanda pictured as a national opera— was left unfinished due to the death of his brother Albert Storosta, with whom he was writing the piece. Later on, it seems he was in touch with Česlovas Sasnauskas and adapted some of his dramas, such as Karalaitė [Princess], as opera librettos, but these projects were not developed[508]. Still, he left ample space for music in his dramas and mysteries. Not as standalone numbers between spoken parts, but as integrated musical and sonic elements. For example, Jūrų varpai [Sea bells] (1920) includes short choral moments integrated within the action, and the repeated sound of sea bells that plays an important dramaturgical role; in the tragedy Pasaulio gaisras [Fire of the world] (1928), sounds of nature create a stage soundscape[509].

Music appears as a choral ensemble not merely "performing a song", but functioning as a choral character that also creates a plastically changing scene on stage. In addition to choral scores, Vydūnas's texts include drawings specifying singer placement and the movements that they have to draw on stage. In Likimo bangos [Waves of fate] (1922), the choir performs "fogs with the forms of women and men", while a personified Nature sleeps, awaiting spring; in Jūrų varpai, the choir acts like sirens, creating the impression of a surging sea in the scene. Fire is also a symbolic element in Vydūnas's pieces: the choir of Amžina ugnis [Eternal fire] (1913) performs a musical-choreographic exaltation of fire; and in Pasaulio gaisras, as Martišiūtė explains, "the collective character is used to create the visions of the creation of the world, the awakening of the natural forces, and the human civilization striving to conquer them. In this drama, the plasticity of the chorus, the ability to change forms, fill the entire space of the stage is extremely important[510]".

The genre of the "mysteries", also called "national mysteries" or "mysteries of the fate of the nation", became especially relevant during the interwar period of independence. Mythological and fantastic depictions of Lithuania's past served as a collective way to channel the new national feeling. Stagings of mysteries and miracles grew into mass events, with increasingly complex music. New titles included harmonized songs and choirs by leading musical figures of the time, such as Jurgis Karnavičius, Jonas Dambrauskas, and Juozas Tallat-Kelpša, who were involved with the State Theater's opera productions or would later stage Lithuanian operas there. Technical staff and artistic directors from the State Theater also collaborated with the staging of mysteries, supporting large open-air stagings, underscoring the need to study these different genres together, given that the authors fluctuated from one to another and their histories are intertwined.

In 1923, the first outdoor mystery was performed in Kaunas, Stebuklo valanda [Miracle hour], with the support of the directors of the State Theater, arousing great enthusiasm within Lithuanian society[511]. Other titles staged at the State Theater, included Spiritus in 1925, with "music and ancient dances"; Likimo keliais [On the paths of destiny] in 1929 by Vincas Krėvė, with folk songs arranged by Karnavičius, and Visi žmonės [All the people] by Antanas Sutkus, with music by J. Tallat-Kelpša, a fantastic piece that announced the inclusion of allegorical characters playing death, angels and demons.

The Catholic Futurist (Ateitininkai) association was also active in organizing open-air stagings of miracles. These became mass events, with spectators even climbing trees to watch performances that included symbolic elements such as smoking altars of eternal fire, ghosts, solemn processions, and, of course, singing choirs[512]. In 1925, Paparčio žiedas [Fern flower] by Liudas Gira was praised as "a real Lithuanian theater, where by reviving ancient theater forms, the national element is placed at its base[513]", celebrating that it had gathered large audiences from diverse social backgrounds, creating an emotional sense of community. The piece staged an allegorical extinction and resurrection of the nation —a ritual of rebirth— mirroring Lithuania's reestablished state.

The year 1930, marking the 500th anniversary of Vytautas the Great's death, was especially remarkable. Amžių karžygys, with text by V. Bičiūnas and choral and orchestral music by Jonas Dambrauskas, was staged "in honor of Vytautas the Great" in the open air at the Kaunas Oak Grove valley[514], featuring more than 50 actors, four full choirs with more than 300 singers, the orchestra of the War Museum, as well as warriors and slaves, horse riders on stage, etc.

Nuvainikuota Vaidilutė, by Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas, with choruses by Jonas Dambrauskas was another grand staging that year. The spirits of Kęstutis and Birutė appear on stage, while Vytautas the Great's echoing voice and God's designation for the fate of Lithuania are heard. With State Theater technical support, over 900 performers (including soldiers), four choirs, pyrotechnics, fantastic dances, horses, and more than 6.000 spectators, it became a truly massive event[515].

As Trinkūnaitė remarks, it is symbolic that, after such a successful trajectory, the last open-air mystery was staged in 1940[516]. However, such events, which gathered so many people and emphasized emotional bonding across different and plural social backgrounds, highlight the important social function these performances served during the interwar period in fostering a shared national feeling.

- Opera

The field of opera was, in both cases, a complicated issue. The capitals of both Catalonia and Lithuania had an opera house, but national authors had difficulty staging their works there. Opera is the most institutional genre, since it requires a building and technical means not available to amateur companies or independent productions. As we have seen, nationalist movements were mostly based on civic activism and were reluctant to collaborate with established institutions. Whether a private opera house without the administrative bureaucracy of the state, such as the Catalan Liceu, or a public institution created by the restored national state, as the case of the State Theater in Kaunas, both focused on international canonical repertoire and provided little opportunity for local composers.

In Catalonia, the Gran Teatre del Liceu, the main Catalan opera house since 1847, generally refused to perform Catalan (or Spanish) operas. This was not opposition to the nationalist movement itself, since the opera house was one of the symbols of Catalan culture. Rather, it was an elitist issue in which Catalan was considered a "popular" language associated with peasants, while Italian was viewed as the language of high culture. As a private enterprise, the owners and artistic directors programmed almost exclusively Italian titles or pieces translated into Italian.

Of the very few Catalan operas staged, such as Els Pirineus [The Pyrenees] (1902) by Pedrell or Empòrium (1906) and Titaina (1912) by Morera, the librettos were translated from Catalan to Italian, provoking protests from the audience[517]. It was not until the 1910s that an exception was made with Jaume Pahissa, who premiered Gal·la Placídia (1913) and La princesa Margarida (1928) —adapted from the successful 1905 musical vision La presó de Lleida, even reusing the same stage design— at the Liceu in Catalan, along with other titles in Spanish in between[518].

At the same time, important sectors of the intellectual elite and specialized press were calling on producers to "raise the level" and produce large-format operas instead of musical dramas or visions, while the opera house systematically refused to perform in Catalan.

> "[While speaking of the musical vision La presó de Lleida] why did he limited himself to gloss the folk song, […] [when] the folk song is just an episode of a whole musical poem? […] How pleasant would it be to see a whole drama, what people call a true drama, a long piece, in three acts, written by a poet following that tragic tale that the folk people tell! […] Do you see that our poets dream of folk songs to create remarkable pieces, long pieces? […]

> Carme Karr[520]"

However, this intellectual elite, so loud in the press criticizing musical dramas, did not follow through with concrete initiatives to support the so missed national opera. When Carme Karr herself collaborated with producer Lluís Graner, she staged a one-act legend, El testament d'Amèlia [Amèlia's testament], including only a few musical numbers based on the folk melody of the same title, for which she required another composer's help with orchestration. As Enric Morera stated:

> "[…] but my triumph establishing a Catalan lyric theater did not sit well for some people. Who could be the ones confronting the evidence? The same ones as always. Those who do nothing. Those who often write on their journals praising themselves to each other. […] Those that do not produce any pieces because they know they can't and that, if they try, they only show their ignorance […] and years and years pass by and the tree of knowledge never gives any fruit, and if it does, it's already dead[521]."

A paradigmatic example was El comte l'Arnau, a folk song staged as a short symbolist piece at the Principal Theater of Barcelona in 1905. It was a huge success, running for more than five months and selling more than 10.000 copies of the booklet with the lyrics, while at the same time Felip Pedrell tried to stage an operatic version of the same folk song in two acts, but failed to arrange a premiere[522].

In Lithuania, the national opera also focused on canonical international opera[523]. It began in 1920 under the Lithuanian Artists' Society and was nationalized in 1922 as a public institution of the new independent state. Its role was largely pedagogical: to introduce Lithuanian audiences to the main titles of the international repertoire (translated into Lithuanian) and to professionalize and consolidate a generation of Lithuanian opera singers. While it achieved the important cultural task of introducing Kaunas to the international opera scene and supporting the national language through the translation of all the productions to Lithuanian, it did not meet the creative needs of a new Lithuanian repertoire. As Trinkūnaitė quotes from Balys Sruoga (1925), the State Theater was not able to respond to that "particularly important time of the nation […] It does not represent [523] Before independence, the Vilnius City Theater hosted only foreign companies, mostly Russian, Ukrainian, and Belarussian troupes. Since 1864, opera and operetta performances were allowed only in the Russian language. Italian troupes also visited frequently until the beginning of the twentieth century (DAUKŠAITĖ, Gražina [2002a]: "Koncertinis ir muzikinis teatrinis gyvenimas Lietuvoje", in: PALIONYTĖ-BANEVIČIENĖ, Danutė (ed.): *Lietuvos muzikos istorija, knyga I. the spirit of the nation, it does not stimulate the creative energy of the nation[524]", since it programmed Polish dramas and foreign opera, leaving very little space for Lithuanian authors.

Firstly, efforts to encourage leading musicians to compose operas failed. The State Theater tried to encourage conductors such as Stasys Šimkus, Juozas Gruodis, and Juozas Tallat-Kelpša offering them internships, but none completed their projects. Tallat-Kelpša, for example, spoke of composing the opera Gintaro pakrantėje [On the Amber coast] as early as 1907. Sent to Italy with the full salary of an opera conductor from 1928 to 1929, he returned with nothing completed and later abandoned the project[525]. For the season 1937/38, the State Theater tried to involve Tallat-Kelpša once more in staging an opera, which was eventually postponed for the season 1940/41. His three-act opera Vilmantė, based on texts by Maironis, J. Talmantas and K. Inčiūra, including stylized folk songs, never saw the light of day, although, according to the press, he had handed in a draft and was orchestrating the piece[526].

Secondly, the State Theater also rejected many existing pieces that had been written independently. One example was Vaidilutė [The Priestess] by Vytautas Bacevičius, which drew on folk laments and panpipe music, written while he was studying in Paris[527]. Auditioned in 1932, it initially received a generally positive evaluation by the management of the theater before it was eventually discarded, since for Juozas Gruodis it was more of "a trial work than a finished work". "The parts of the singers seem monotonous and primitive, if you don't count the intervals and small notes that are not convenient for the singer. […] The periods of the text sometimes do not match the periods of the music. […] Chorus with existing accompaniment, if at all possible, would be very difficult to perform." But also, "the libretto of that opera is too naive for the opera written with it to be shown publicly[528]." Bacevičius had arranged it himself, inspired by V. Mykolaitis-Putinas's mysteries, in a Symbolist tone with mystic and moral-patriotic motifs, including symbols of both paganism and Christianity. However, when Gruodis himself attempted to start writing an opera that same year, he eventually handed the libretto to another composer, finding the chosen text of Tyrų duktė [The Daughter of Tyrai] by Bronė Buivydaitė too lyrical[529].

Either because the works submitted were not technically strong enough[530] or because their aesthetic proposals were not accepted, the State Theater kept delaying the staging of [530] Lithuanian educational institutions had been moved abroad by the Tsarist administration, and musical education was to be reestablished in Lithuania during the period of independence. The first music school in Kaunas was opened in 1919, and the one in Klaipėda started operating in 1923. Composers who studied abroad and were trained in new modernist styles and trends faced difficulties when coming back to Lithuania, since relevant teachers at the Kaunas Conservatoire, such as Juozas Naujalis, openly opposed

Lithuanian operas and was not especially cooperative with younger composers. Reflecting on the institutions of interwar Lithuania, Vytautas Bacevičius wrote in a 1948 letter to Jeronimas Kačinskas:

> "How can you expect anything good from strangers when your own people used to be as angry as wolves? You must remember the times of the bureaucratical Ministry of Education in Lithuania, and what the Kaunas "Art Temple", i.e. Theater, used to do to young artists[531]."

Criticism mounted, and some figures, such as Mikas Petrauskas, who had been especially proactive in the promotion of Lithuanian musical theater, openly addressed the issue in 1928:

> "[…] our Kaunas Opera has nothing Lithuanian. We, Lithuanians, are so low in our music field, almost like the inhabitants of wild nations. Our artists do not try to promote their art at all, saying that our art does not exist. The society, having also received the mess of a foreign culture, got used to it, because it is more solemn and, of course, cheaper, accessible without difficulty[532]."

Since the premiere of Birutė in 1906, no new Lithuanian opera was staged in Lithuanian lands until Gražina in 1933[533], with music by Jurgis Karnavičius and a libretto based on A. Mickevičius's homonymous poem. In the meantime, Birutė had been restaged in 1909 in Vilnius; in 1910 in Rokiškis and Marijampolė (where it was performed again in 1914); and in 1919, 1921, and 1925 in Kaunas[534]. Petrauskas's second opera, Eglė—žalčių karalienė, premiered in 1924 in Chicago and did not reach Lithuanian stages until 1939, when it was reorchestrated by J. Dambrauskas for the State Theater in Kaunas[535].

Karnavičius, for his part, had already written stage music before Gražina for different mysteries. The next Lithuanian opera, Trys talismanai [Three talismans], was in fact an arrangement of an earlier mystery by Kazys Inčiūra with music by Antanas Račiūnas. Lithuanian musical theater had remained vibrant, but largely in the form of non-operatic genres.

Modernism (see STANEVIČIŪTĖ, Rūta (2024): Figures of Modernity…, op. cit., pp. 131–39). However, many Catalan composers were not highly skilled either, since conservatoires were introduced in Spain quite late. The first music school in Barcelona opened in 1886, and Enric Morera, who went to Brussels to study harmony, often complained that young Catalan composers could not even harmonize folk songs properly (Morera 1936, pp. 39–42) and that directors and authors were "bad musicians, without any knowledge whatsoever" (Morera 1936, 37-38) who would not be able to play his compositions. There are testimonies that, for example, the musical vision L'any mil (The year one thousand), commissioned by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, could not be staged because the composer Joan Llongueras did not know how to properly orchestrate it for a full theater orchestra, leaving an unfinished draft. (MANENT [ed.]; MEDINA [ed.] [1997]: Epistolari de Josep Carner, vol. 3…, op. cit., pp. 77–78).

[532] Quoted in BUROKAITĖ, Jūratė (ed.) (1976): Mikas Petrauskas…, op. cit., pp. 97–100.

[533] Gražina was premiered not without prior criticism and controversy about the nationality of its author, since Karnavičius, although Lithuanized, was of Russian origin. Similar criticism can also be seen in the Catalan context, where Enric Morera and Amadeu Vives were considered by the most radical nationalists as traitors to the Catalan cause because, at some point in their careers, they had written or translated pieces into Spanish and had staged them outside Catalonia.

For one reason or another, national authors found it difficult to access the opera houses. The institutionalization of national culture, though it provided the means for better and more stable productions, did not necessarily make it easier for national authors to see their works staged.

Although there are clear contextual differences that affect the quality, quantity, and outcome of the studied repertoire, the underlying discourses about the need for a new national culture —one that paid special attention to musical theater— and the creative approaches to nationalizing dramatic genres are very similar in both national movements. There are also stylistic differences: Lithuanian composers were influenced by the Russian, Polish, and German schools, while Catalan composers were mainly influenced by Italian and French music, as well as by the zarzuela tradition from Castilian Spain. However, the genres they approach to create a national culture, as well as the techniques and symbolic elements they employed to represent the national identity followed similar patterns.

These shared patterns allow us to conclude: 1) The Catalan musical theater scene and the discourses on the creation of their own national genre, independent of traditional Castilian and Italian influences, did not imply nor resulted in cultural isolation or disconnection from European trends. Other regions experiencing nationalist awakenings, such as Lithuania, were undergoing similar processes that led to similar results in the field of musical theater. 2) The new Lithuanian culture that began to flourish after the legalization of the Lithuanian language, even if not counting with many well-skilled authors and professional companies, was not far behind other sub-state nationalist movements that already had established cultural institutions, such as the Catalan case. By linking both cases, we shift from viewing them as isolated, local phenomena to seeing them as part of a wider transnational process that multiple regions experienced contemporaneously in the context of sub-state national awakenings.

The sociocultural context must also be considered. By the early 20th century, opera was already undergoing a process of canonization, with the same titles repeated increasingly often on international billboards. The creation and premiere of new pieces took place instead in the field of popular musical theater, which was not bound by the rigid institutional structures of grand opera houses. In both cases, the histories of opera and popular musical theater were intertwined, with the same composers, writers, and actors contributing to both. The modernization of society called for new formats, such as operetta or musical drama with spoken parts, rather than long-format, fully sung operas. In Catalonia and Lithuania, very few operatic titles by national composers were premiered, while a large repertoire of operettas and mythological musical dramas was produced. Even if operas may be of greater qualitative interest from a musical perspective, quantitatively, the short-format genres prevailed by far.

From Birutė (1906), considered the first Lithuanian opera, to Trys talismanai (1936), the last before the 1940 occupation, only five new titles can be counted[536], while more than one hundred Lithuanian operettas were produced in the same period between Lithuania and its diaspora[537]. If we consider which were the largest and most massively attended events, these were the open-air mysteries. For example, Nuvainikuota Vaidilutė, by Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas with choirs by Jonas Dambrauskas, was staged for the 500th anniversary of Vytautas the Great's death in 1930, involving more than 900 people on stage (including four choirs and even soldiers with horses) with the technical staff of the State Theater providing pyrotechnics and other effects[538].

The Catalan repertoire presents a similar situation. Very few Catalan operas were staged, and some were even forced by the Catalan opera house to be translated into Italian, such as Els Pirineus [I Pirinei] (1902) by Felip Pedrell or Empòrium and Bruniselda by Enric Morera (1906), which caused protests among the public. While composers struggled to stage their operas at the Liceu opera house, just down the same street, the Principal theater of Barcelona had their names on its billboard announcing musical visions such as La matinada by Pedrell —innovative in its use of electric light as a dramaturgical element— and El comte l'Arnau by Morera. Musical dramas by Morera and the renowned writer Àngel Guimerà were as well successfully premiered at the Principal Theater: La santa espina (1907), which included a sardana that became Catalonia's unofficial anthem, and La reina vella [The old queen] (1908), staged amid discussions of nominating Guimerà for the Nobel Prize.

There was a strong will to reach the people, to engage the broader population in the new national project, and to awaken in them a shared national consciousness. For this purpose, popular genres were more effective than operas, which reached only a smaller, elite audience. The mass stagings of Lithuanian open-air miracles with thousands of participants created a sense of communal belonging. The Catalan musical visions presented a short-format entertainment for families to transmit rural folkloric references to children in industrial cities in recreative salons. The popular operettas performed by amateurs engaged smaller communities and promoted the use of the national language.

The social impact of these genres, and their ability to attract large cross-class audiences, made them especially valuable to activist movements of national awakening. By contrast, the staging of a national opera only congregated a smaller elite concentrated in the capitals. Still, producing national opera remained relevant for opera house audiences and for international promotion within operatic circuits. While both projects coexisted within nationalist movements, it is important to notice that they respond to different sociocultural needs, and that, in order to reach the full social spectrum of the national community that "has to be awakened", not only one single genre could meet by itself the varied aesthetic needs of different ideological groups and social classes.

Therefore, opera should not be seen as the ultimate stage that has to be reached to consider a cultural process of nation-building successful. This has often been the traditional scholarly approach, reinforced by the discourse that intellectual elites held at that time, who claimed that musical comedies and dramas should evolve into the more complex and literary form of national opera. Following this argument, simpler or more popular genres have been dismissed by scholars as failures or proto-stages in the process of achieving a national opera, attributed to authors' lack of training or audiences' lack of education. While such factors may have played a role, it is important to recognize the social function of these repertoires in national awakenings, where the goal was to instill national consciousness throughout society.

It was not only about creating a form of high culture in the national language to prove the nation's "civilized" status. More importantly, especially if we consider quantitatively the number of premiered titles, it was about engaging people in the national project by providing forms of culture they were already inclined to consume. The issue was not simply to "educate" audiences to move from vaudeville to national opera because they lacked artistic criteria, but also to provide them with vaudevilles in the national language, portraying situations from traditional daily life and replacing foreign repertoires so that audiences could see their own culture represented on stage in the form of genres that they already consumed.

Thus, rather than creating entirely new "national genres" with unique styles or dramaturgies, these movements "nationalized" existing genres and aesthetic trends by inserting elements with symbolic national meaning: quotations of folk songs or folk-styled intonations, folk dances and rhythms, tales and myths arranged as plots for the plays, or depictions of traditional customs from the daily life of folk villagers. Pointing to the need to rethink nationalistic approaches to the history of musical theater, this vision aligns with Tatjana Marković's theories about nineteenth-century national operas as national variations emerged from shared, common international genres, rather than as the isolated creation of multiple and distinct individual national genres[539].

Part II

The Symbolist genre of musical visions

Section III

Analytical definition of the musical visions genre

Chapter 7:
Formal and dramaturgical conception of the musical visions genre

"Musical visions" form a genre of Symbolist lyric theater that originated within the Modernist movement of Catalan lyric theater. The aim of its authors and promoters was to create a genre that was authentically and intrinsically Catalan, not only because Catalan was the only language used to write the works, but also because their dramaturgy was rooted in cultural elements that were inseparable from Catalan identity. Under this premise, an elaborate proposal was theorized, initially developed by Adrià Gual under the name "cançons populars catalanes harmonitzades per a l'escena" [Catalan folk songs harmonized for the stage][540]. Later on, Lluís Graner took over and institutionalized the genre with a stable full season and a permanent specialized venue, renaming it "musical visions."

The dramaturgy of the new genre had to be rooted in and based on popular folklore; in other words, folk stories would be glossed as the creative engine and structural axis of the piece. Its main feature was that these stories would not merely serve as material to inspire the writing of a new drama, but that the folkloric material collected from oral sources would be respected as much as possible, since it contained the timeless essence of Catalan identity passed down from generation to generation. The national lyrical genre was to act as a continuation of this oral tradition in the urban and industrial environment, remaining faithful to the original material. Authors would then gloss the original materials, interspersing additional verses or musical sentences to prolong the extension of the piece.

Therefore, musical visions involved the materialization of popular oral imagery to visualize it on stage, hence their designation as "visions". In this process, folk culture was also modernized using spectacular stage sets and effects, renewing interest in traditional content by presenting it in an appealing form. This proposal arose from traditionalist and conservative Catalanism, which accepts modernizing the form to attract contemporary audiences and to offer a competitive format in the urban scene, but reintroducing folkloric and moral content in the face of a disruptive Modernism that had broken with tradition.

Musical visions would gloss folk songs, traditional legends and children's fables coming from popular songbooks and ballads compiled by folklorists of the time. However, their staging would avoid Costumbrismo aesthetics (a style focused on portraying customs and manners in a realist way, predominant in zarzuela) and would be developed under a Symbolist approach, influenced by Maeterlinckian medievalism. The plays would have little action and no real plot development, relying instead on the presentation of timeless medieval scenes or tableaux, and the suggestion of sensations or situations through a thoughtful use of music, lighting, color, and other available theatrical and scenographic resources.

[540] BATLLE I JORDÀ, Carles (2001): Adrià Gual (1891–1902)..., op. cit., pp. 233–269.

This chapter aims to provide a first analytical definition of this lyrical genre, which has been largely overlooked in academia and is unprecedented in existing literature. In other words, the aim is not to analyze and comment on different works belonging to the genre as individual and separate cases. Instead, once the corpus that forms the repertoire of musical visions has been compiled and documented, the intention is to identify the characteristics common to all the works that allow them to be grouped together and understood as a single genre. It does not aim to create a new category under a revisionist perspective but rather following the perception of the public opinion at the time, which did not hesitate to classify a work as a "musical vision" or not when reviewing it in the press, clearly differentiating musical visions from other existing lyrical genres. Below, an outline of the characteristics of the scenic, literary, and musical elements that make up musical visions is provided.

- Set design and staging

The relevance of the visual proposal is evident in the very name given to the genre: musical "visions". The great contribution of these works was to visually represent well-known legends and songs of Catalan folklore, allowing the audience to see these orally transmitted forms plastically rendered in scenes of vivid color and perspective. The season-opening program of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner announced them as "Great Musical Plastic Tableaux. Staging of popular themes, visions of nature, history, customs, etc." In this way, rural folklore would be renewed through an attractive and astonishing staging, thus modernizing folk culture and adapting it to the current tastes of contemporary audience, facilitating access to urban societies.

Musical visions materialize on stage the images that belong to collective imagination. These are indeed imagined but have no visual representation in their original form as a song or a poeticized legend. In fact, following what Gual first did with Blancaflor, the fairy tale La Fustots [Cinderella], with text by Josep Carner (under the pseudonym Sever de la Cantonada), treats the representation of the fantastic story on stage as if it were an open window into the characters' imaginations: it begins with a scene in which a grandmother sits with her granddaughter to tell her the story of La Fustots, which we see represented as the back wall covering the stage set comes into view, as if we were diving into their daydreams.

The short form will predominate in musical visions, all in a single act but featuring a multiplicity of very brief scenes that favor the diversity of sets and tableaux that make up the vision. However, this dramaturgical principle involves difficulties in staging: folk legends and songs are not intended for the stage; they feature frequent changes and multiple spaces, as well as a highly condensed narrative, all of which must be resolved to bring them to the stage. La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida], written by Adrià Gual with music by Jaume Pahissa, exemplifies this spatial problem. In just one act, it presents five different sceneries, with different sets and scenic constructions for each. This spatial dynamism goes so far that the fifth scene presents only 12 lines of text, but "2 tormenter curtains. Backdrop with a stone carpet, 1 passable ladder 1.7 meters high by 2 meters long, [...], 1 ramp, 1 visual element, 1 corner scaffolded section[541]" were built specifically for it.

This ephemeral multiplicity of sets is not only required by the dramatic action of the piece but is also demanded by the audience. In Els tres tambors [The three drummers], also with text by Adrià Gual and music by Enric Morera, the set for the first scene is reused in the third, because the story told by the song required returning to the same space where it began. However, this was poorly received by the critics, accustomed to a large variety of backdrops within the same piece:

> "The new musical production Els tres tambors has been presented with great splendor, as is customary at that theater. [...] The decorations, by the expert set designers Mr. Moragas and Mr. Alarma, are in both their overall design and their details two exquisite works. [...] The costumes are magnificent. It's a pity that the third scene, repeating the first stage set, ends up disappointing the audience![542]"

Many legends also feature fantastic effects, such as the disappearance or appearance of characters on stage, or special lighting that recreates weather effects or creates special ambiences. The text of El comte l'Arnau by Josep Carner calls, for example, for a cloudbank to form in the first tableau and for the hermitage to be set ablaze, for the castle to be fantastically illuminated in the third scene and for the soldiers to vanish, or for the fireplace to suddenly go out and for the count to disappear from view in the fourth. Moreover, the count should cross the stage on horseback several times. The use of animals on stage seemed common, whether fake (like the geese that appear in La Fustots) or real (as in the case of the sheep herd of sheep that cross the stage in La matinada [The sunrise]). In the latter, moreover, the lighting plays an essential role because the play's only tableau is based on this luminous crescendo that recreates the sunrise.

Following this line, Fra Garí [Friar Garí], with text by Xavier Viura and music by Morera, also stands out using multiple sound effects, such as bell tolls, the rumble of a cavalcade, the resounding of trumpets, neighing horses, infernal noises, thunder, etc. Also, in the second scene, a squadron of witches and warlocks appears with fantastical brooms, dancing wildly; in the middle of the dance the devil rises amid a blaze of flames, only to be plunged down at the end of the scene by a great earthquake. The scenic resources were to be ingenious and approach, on the one hand, the magic genre from theater, and, on the other, the fantastic effects of the nascent cinematographic language.

Therefore, we have sound effects, lighting, music, stage sets, and colorful backdrops painted with projected perspective. All of these are the elements that shape the "great musical plastic tableaux"; therefore, they are conceived as a synthesis of the arts, a total work of art that uses all available means to create the settings and atmospheres of each tableau. This apparent visual spectacularity that serves as an appeal for the public has a Symbolist origin and intent: there is no complex dramatic action that develops the play; it is rather based on the creation of emotions through the atmospheres created with music, scenography, and the spoken word. Thus, it plays with impressions and the creation of moods that align the perception of the work with the feeling it aims to convey:

> "And once the lyrics and music [of El comte l'Arnau] have come together, the set designers step in and complete the work by giving it an appropriate ambience, worthy of the beautiful legend that serves as the basis for the lyrics and music[543]."

> "For the five panels that make up the work [La presó de Lleida], the set designers Messrs. Moragas, Alarma, Vilomara, and Junyent have painted beautiful decorations, perfectly balanced in color and, above all, in ambience[544]."

The musical visions move between a verisimilar depiction of medieval reality (La presó de Lleida, Els tres tambors, Donzella qui va a la guerra... [Damsel that goes to war…]) and a symbolic level, because these stories represent, beyond the historical facts, the cultural tradition and people's values that make up Catalan identity. The most fantastic legends and tales (Fra Garí, El comte l'Arnau, La Fustots, El miracle del Tallat [The miracle of Tallat]…) take the use of scenic resources to the limit, as they aim to attract audience through their senses with spectacular effects that grab their attention. Still, they remain connected to identity symbolism: these performances are making the imaginary tales of childhood become a sensorial reality, materializing the stories that were orally passed down interconnecting generations and creating a common culture of belonging.

The perseverance in showcasing people's traditions and values simultaneously represents the shift from decadent to vitalist Symbolism, more likely prompted by the criticisms that Gual and Rusiñol received between 1898 and 1899 alleging that the decadent style was not inherent to Catalan culture. Now, under Graner's Catholic vision, the new lyric genre sought to become a celebration of the Catalan identity, a proof of its present vigor. While at the end of the 19th century L'Avenç defended a plural but anti-Catholic Modernism, now the musical visions produced at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner were reintroducing folkloric, traditional, and Catholic content adapted to a modern Symbolist staging. They are rather closer to a pre-Noucentisme conception in sharing Josep Carner's idea of an ahistoricial patriotism (this "imaginary epoch" that Gual mentions in his musical visions librettos).

In fact, religiosity is very much present in the religious scenes and poems that were staged as musical visions, such as La nit de Nadal [Christmas Eve], La resurrecció de Llàtzer [The resurrection of Lazarus], or the Christmas scenes of El mal rabadà [The bad shepherd]. Even some of the most fantastical legends are tied to Christianity, such as Fra Garí, taking place at the hermit of Montserrat, or Lo miracle del Tallat, about the apparition of the Virgin of the Tallat mountain. Religiosity is defended as an intrinsic part of Catalan cultural tradition, as part of this folk culture that musical visions must modernize to keep people's cultural heritage alive for future generations.

- Texts

Many of the texts musical visions were based on actually come from poetry. For instance, La nit de Nadal is based entirely on the eponymous poem by Francesc Casas i Amigó. From the commissions planned for the Principal theater, Ramon Lull was also based on a poem by Magí Morera, Les coves d'Artà [The caves of Artà] were "moments from the poem La deixa del geni grec [The legacy of the Greek genie] by priest Miquel Costa i Llobera," and L'any mil [The year one thousand] was planned to be a "musical vision with choruses based on the poetry of Ángel Guimerà[545]".

The musical visions of the Mercè hall also shared this characteristic. La dona d'aigua [Undine] was most likely a gloss on the poem Les dones d'aigua written in 1898 by Miquel Costa i Llobera, and La mare de déu quan era xiqueta… [The Mother of God when she was a girl...] had already been glossed as a poem by Adrià Gual, winning the Gold and Silver Viola at the 1898 Floral Games. From Jacint Verdaguer, the poem La mort de l'escolà [The death of the altar boy] that had been set to music by Antoni Nicolau in 1900 was staged, as well as the introduction of his poetry book L'Atlàntida, set to music by Enric Morera in 1893.

Even some, like A la voreta del mar [By the sea], had its text drawn entirely from popular folklore, although it was more common for a poet or playwright to adapt the folk lyrics. In the preceding decades a folklorist movement had been developing in Catalonia, and popular songs from rural areas had been compiled. The main folkloric compilation that would have served as a source for playwrights and composers would have been the Cançoner popular edited by Aureli Capmany and published by La Renaixença, especially the first series from 1901–1903, including illustrations by Lluís Graner and Adrià Gual. Many musical visions from the first season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner (1905/06) are glosses of songs included here (La presó de Lleida, El Comte l'Arnau, Els tres tambors...) and many other songs included in this compilation were also glossed at the Mercè hall (Lo Decembre congelat, La porquerola, La Mare de Déu, La pastoreta, etc.).

To a lesser extent, the Romançer popular de la terra catalana, published by Marià Aguiló in 1893, was also used as a reference, in which, for example, the legend of Donzella qui va a la guerra staged at the Principal theater in 1906, and the story of Blancaflor that Adrià Gual glossed together with Enric Granados between 1897 and 1899 already appeared. The reuse of old texts intensifies the characteristic intertextuality of this repertoire and expands the network of references between the original legend or song, its poeticized version, and the new stage production.

Counting on the lyricism derived from this relationship with poetry and the formal brevity of poems and songs, the dramaturgical aim is to present suggestive situations—the momentary visualization of previously imagined scenes taken from collective popular imagery. Therefore, the musical visions do not develop proper dramatic actions as traditional dramatic literature does, especially the smaller-scale visions at the Mercè hall or similar venues. For instance, in the case of La resurrecció de Llàtzer, set to lyrics by Josep Carner, critics note the simplicity of the action: a first tableau with the family weeping over Lazarus's death and a second in which Christ miraculously resurrects Lazarus, but they emphasize how heartfelt the lyrics are and the "moments of deep emotion" they evoke.

A similar critique was made of El bon escarceller [The good jailer], with an "action so simple [that] it moves you" and a synthesis of text, music, and set design with a result that is "at once decorative and human". La pastoreta [The shepherd girl] was similarly described, made of a "simple and sweetly moving action". As well, La nit de Nadal "consists of five tableaux [...] and, despite the lack of action, they produce a very pleasant effect, delighting the eyes and the spirit".

Precisely because of their brevity, the musical visions were criticized by the Wagnerian wing of the Catalan nationalist press, led mainly by Joventut, a proponent of a fully-sung lyric drama with extensive literary development and complex dramatic action. For example, they said of La matinada in a pejorative tone: "All in all, five or six minutes of spectacle". In fact, the faction closest to Wagnerism and favorable to opera understood that a one-act lyric play alternating sung and spoken passages was only meant to be a step toward the consolidation of a true opera.

Nevertheless, the format of musical visions was short by definition, and the audience perceived its brevity as characteristic of the genre. The alternation between musical visions and the film screenings that preceded the plays foreshadowed a model of rapid consumption and short formats.

- Music

The process of glossing popular songs and extending them to create a full-fledged dramatization in a theatrical performance involves fragmenting the original song so that new written material can be inserted between its strophes. This is the case, for example, with El fill del rei, Campaneta la ning-ning or A la voreta del mar, which maintain throughout the whole piece the character of the original folk melody, only introducing variations that prolong the composition. Typically, folk songs are based on the repetition and variation of the same strophic pattern, so this fragmentation means that the melodic formula will be repeated throughout the work, giving it cohesion and musical unity. Additionally, motifs from the melodic theme are used to construct part of the orchestral material that accompanies the work along the sung moments.

This use of motifs or the repetition of the main theme does not mean that they function as a Wagnerian leitmotif. Instead, the process here is based on the composition of a piece based on a main theme that is used as a vocal melody harmonized by the orchestra, or as an orchestrated instrumental theme. This procedure differs from the leitmotiv in its construction of musical interrelationships and associations, since the folk motifs in musical visions have a symbolic nationalist value, rather than aiming at creating a musical narratological discourse as leitmotivs do.

In cases of popular legends that also have a musical version, such as El comte l'Arnau, there is already original material on which the musical composition can be based. However, for other legends that have not traditionally been set to music, the musical parts must now be composed, as is the case with Fra Garí or Lo miracle del Tallat. The musical visions that do not directly quote folk songs still retain the characteristics of folk singing: it is a syllabic style in which each syllable corresponds to a note and does not incur into vocal runs or melismas; it maintains a melodic linearity, in which the same note is repeated on consecutive syllables and the melodic movements do not reach distant notes, and it is as well constructed in strophes that repeat the same melodic formula.

Thus, it avoids the melodic lyricism characteristic of bel canto, which, from the moral and pedagogical perspective this genre was conceived, would be superfluous and gratuitous entertainment, that "accustomed the ears to vice and comforts" and corrupted the purity of emotions words intended to inspire. Instead, composers aimed for a much flatter and more linear vocal design, approaching the concept of volksmusik as one of the pillars of German cultural nationalism that served as their reference point. Their goal was to stylize folk singing —a key element of cultural identity— so their vocal lines, when not directly quoting traditional melodies, were of a narrow melodic range, moving in narrow intervals usually in conjunct motion. If we take as an example the scores by Joan B. Lambert (some of the very few that remain complete from the Mercè hall) and the fragments published in the press by Borràs de Palau, we can see how the voice generally pivoted between the tonic and the dominant, relying on the intermediate notes as passing points, while instrumentally a higher degree of chromaticism and dissonance was introduced in search of musical interest and modernity in harmonic color.

Another musical element from folklore that is present, in addition to folk song melodies or the imitation of folk singing style, is the rhythms of traditional dances, especially the sardana. Plenty of musical visions include a sardana, which coincides with moments of festivity or celebration and would give rise to a dance number on stage, while Catalan operettas and vaudevilles tended to include waltzes instead. For instance, Els tres tambors includes a sardana to celebrate the arrival of the soldiers in the first scene; the third scene of La nit de Nadal consists of a shepherds' sardana; El bon escarceller includes two sardana numbers danced and sung by a group of kids in contrast to the sad ballad sung by the imprisoned count. Similarly, Donzella que va a la guerra, Lo miracle del Tallat and Fra Garí also include dance numbers.

All of the aforementioned characteristics were very specific to musical visions and clearly differentiated these pieces from other lyric genres. While, for instance, Enric Morera's works for his Teatre Líric Català season were often called "sarsueles" [Catalanized word for "zarzuelas"] by the press or even in the printed editions of the scores, musical visions were understood as a genre of Catalan lyric theater distinct from zarzuela and opereta. The particular case of La sardana dels promesos [The sardana of engaged couples] — the only lyric work from the first season of Espectacles-Audicions Graner that was not advertised as a musical vision— shows us how clear the critics were about the difference between genres: whether they were for or against it, all the critics agreed that this was not a musical vision, but a zarzuela "chica" or a comedy based on traditional customs[546].

This custom-based comedy does not follow any of the parameters of Adrià Gual's popular theater theory: it is neither based on a legend nor a folktale, nor does it include traditional songs. It deals with a religious festival typical of the Empordà region and uses the sardana rhythm for the main musical number, but it does not partake in the medievalist ahistoricism characteristic of the other musical visions, nor does it generate the characteristic intertextuality or intermodality of those visions quoting other poems or songs previously known from folk tradition. Instead of recreating sensorial ambiences and situations through scenic settings in brief tableaux, it develops a comic plot among the characters. In other words, it combines all the characteristics of regionalist zarzuela and was understood as such, even if premiered among musical visions.

The case of La matinada is also exceptional, because it is announced as a "vision of nature" that does not directly quote any folk song, legend, or tale; rather, it is a single plastic tableau in which the shepherds' choir sings happily as they begin a new day, with a lighting effect that recreates the sunrise. However, since it does conform to the scenic and symbolic characteristics of the plastic tableaux that make up the rest of the musical visions, it was understood by the audience and press without any discussions as a musical vision. The reception of these works demonstrates that the musical visions succeeded in being received and perceived as a genre distinct from the Spanish zarzuela, with defining and distinctive characteristics.

[546] Further details about the piece and the criticism received can be found at the corresponding entry for La sardana dels promesos in volume II.

❖ The imagery of musical visions. Between popular folklore and nationalist symbolism[547]

After a brief analysis of the dramaturgical conception of the genre to understand what these works were based on and how they were presented to the public, we will proceed to analyze the scenic imagery of musical visions: what content forms their creative foundations, which elements recur to the point of becoming characteristic of the genre, what symbolic functions they perform, and what value they have or convey to the viewer. In other words, musical visions mainly glossed legends, folk songs, and religious episodes; therefore, emphasis will be placed on defining the symbolic value given to them, the implicit or explicit ideological discourse of these elements, and their affiliation or connection with the movements and concerns of the moment in the political and religious spheres.

The pieces that make up the repertoire of musical visions have undergone a process of multimodal content analysis using qualitative methods, which ultimately allows us to make quantitative generalizations applicable to the musical visions genre as a whole. To this end, each literary text is taken as a unit of analysis in search of lexical elements that define or determine the recurring and characteristic objects that make up the imagery that the musical visions recreate on stage. Consecutively, other semiotic elements that interact with the textual ones are analyzed. Taking into consideration the multimedia nature of lyric theater, a multimodal approach would also require paying attention to the visual imagery that is being portrayed on stage, especially if we keep in mind that many producers and artistic directors were professional painters. Scenography and lighting elements will therefore receive special attention.

An initial classification will then be made, dividing the repertoire of musical visions into two groups: those based on folklore and those based on religious episodes. As a result, noble characters related to the ancient territorial entities of Catalonia prior to their integration into Castilian institutions and law are identified as characteristic objects of the imagery of legendary visions, in addition to castles and other elements of the medieval landscape that are temporally decontextualized and presented with a timeless significance. On the other hand, religious visions based on biblical episodes or saint characters typically feature Virgin Mary, baby Jesus, and other biblical and saintly figures. Luminous elements symbolically highlight their appearances, and landscapes related to places of worship, such as the monastery of Montserrat or the silhouette of its mountains are recreated on stage. Another common element is the infernal as a representation of moral punishment, including the usual appearance of demons and witches in the works. As well, some of them recreate visions of hell on stage as Catalan folklore depicts it, including for instance the cauldrons of Pere Botero, a popular folk character that inhabits hell according to Catalan fables.

Lastly, findings should be situated within a wider historical and sociocultural discourse. Among nationalist thinkers followed by the promoters and theoreticians of the musical visions genre, Torras i Bages can be identified as the religious reference regarding the relationship between Catholic spirituality and national identity. As the spiritual leader of the Saint Lluc Artists' Circle, he preached the indivisibly linking of Catholic faith and Catalan identity with his lapidary phrase "Catalonia will be Christian or it will not be". His approach explains why Catholic imagery and biblical episodes were considered as part of Catalan folklore to be glossed in musical visions. In the political field, Prat de la Riba's theories on the historical elements that make up Catalan identity can be traced. As he considered, Catalan nationality was based on a common archaic language, the past existence of a Catalan territorial entity preceding the nation-state, and their previous own legal tradition. Therefore, his vision of nationality would explain the emphasis on medievalized settings and the recurrent appearance of Catalan nobility in musical visions.

The results presented are obtained by ultimately comparing the ideological theories of the aforementioned authors with the elements identified in the imagery of musical visions, understood as semiotic components of the same discourse. The purpose is to verify whether the elements seen on stage are endowed with an ideological function based on these theories and whether their semiotic treatment acquires symbolic value. Following the idea of the discursive-material knot, whereby discourse and material are inseparable and constitutive of the same process, the empirical study of the content of musical visions required a parallel discursive interpretation which, in turn, conditioned the empirical documentation phase.

- Medievalism and Catalan nobility

If the content of the stories selected to be brought to the stage is analyzed, certain consistent trends can be identified: medieval timelessness, the presence of noble characters from the Catalan counties and the Aragonese Crown, and, of course, the exclusive use of the Catalan language, with a markedly archaic tone naturally contextualized within this mythological medievalism. At first glance, these elements would appear in the theatrical repertoire of musical visions in a casual or incidental manner, legitimized as they are already common from the stories narrated in folk ballads and songbooks. Given that the dramaturgical principle of musical visions is glossing popular folklore, respecting the original content collected from the sources and varying it as little as possible, these folk themes and characteristic motifs would become the same ones that characterize the new lyric genre. This approach was thought to keep intact and preserve the essence of Catalan national culture that resided in folklore[548], and it was the technique used to "nationalize" the genre and ensure that its dramaturgical conception was intrinsically related to Catalan identity.

Timeless or ahistorical medievalism is one of the implicit characteristics of folklore, which also ends up characterizing the repertoire of musical visions. Both the exteriors of castles (including the construction of large towers and staircases) and their interiors (large stone halls, arches, and wooden porticos) will be the most common spaces recreated on stage, accompanied by appropriate costumes. However, these scenes will rather serve as evocative settings, since the works do not mention specific historical events that place them in a real past, nor dates or places that specify them in a historicist manner but instead act as representations of an idealized or mythological past.

For instance, the musical vision El comte l'Arnau [Count Arnau] by Josep Carner and Enric Morera is based on a historical legend, re-elaborated in multiple versions, being one of them the lyrics of the folk song that is glossed on this stage version. Although some detailed versions of the legend locate count Arnau in a castle from the 11th century in Mataplana, providing a specific chronology for the lifetime of the main character, the stage version follows the lyrism of the folk song, focusing on the images and scenes that form each episode narrated by the folk song, eluding all kinds of chronological details, evoking a mythological medieval time not tied to historicist details. Nevertheless, the stage set does closely recreate the hermit of Mataplana (the only standing building from the complex) and follows a similar style when recreating the stoned interior of the castle with the semicircular arches of the doors (some of the very few remains from the actual historical castle).

[548] BATLLE I JORDÀ, Carles (2001): Adrià Gual (1891–1902)..., op. cit., pp. 240–251.

In the case of El miracle del Tallat, the libretto actually provides a summary of the folk legend from 15th century and provides the reference of the first text that published it in modern times, indicating that the story is said to explain the origins of the sanctuary on the Tallat mountain. The actual stage version, written by Carner and Morera, only makes a short incidental reference to the Tallat mountain when the captive Catalan Christian prays to the Virgin of the Tallat Mountain, being miraculously rescued by angels that leave him at the top of said mountain. Therefore, while chronological references are systematically avoided in the pieces, spatial ones are included when they're useful to locate the pieces in Catalan lands, also giving the chance for set designers to represent recognizable medieval landscapes from Catalan nature and historical buildings on stage.

The case would be slightly different for visions that stage fables and fairytales that take place in imaginary or non-located places, presenting spaces that are fully imagined. For instance, the interior of the castle of La nina dormida al bosc [the Catalan version of Sleeping Beauty], designed by scenographer Josep Castells, festively decorated in the first act, and in ruins in the second after 333 years, is completely imagined, since the original story does not provide a geographical context. In fact, the libretto locates the piece in "legendary times", not providing either a chronological reference. Visions based on popular fables would encounter the same situation, like, for instance, the production of La Fustots [the Catalan version of Cinderella], with a text arranged by Josep Carner and using pre-existing musical fragments by Schumann.

Figures 127 & 128: Stage pictures of the castle of La nina dormida al bosc *in the first and second acts. [*La hormiga de oro 19 (11/05/1907), p. 300].

Besides the straight-forward staging of folklore and mythology, some musical visions especially aimed for children also came up with new fables and fantastic stories, following the style of popular children's folk tales. The repertoire written for the Imperi hall and the Montserrat hall in Arenys de Mar, as well as the later seasons of the Mercè hall in Barcelona, was mostly on this kind of children fables. Despite not directly quoting stories from real historical folklore they, these plays maintained the same medievalistic and nobiliary elements, aligned with the characteristic aesthetics of folk musical visions.

For instance, El príncep qui s'és enamorat [The prince that has fallen in love], written by Joan Draper for the Montserrat hall, develop in two short scenes the love story between a prince and a peasant girl that saves him when he has an accident while hunting, with the final permission of the king to marry her. It includes a hunting song and a damsels' chorus composed by Xavier Maimí. Similarly, L'infant príncep [The infant prince], written by Josep Maria Navarro Porcel with music by Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, put on the stage of the Imperi hall the story of an unloved child that turned out to be the king's lost heir, taken to his palace by a fairy.

Other productions from the same hall followed similar plots, like La pomera [The apple tree], by Manuel Marinel·lo and Montserrat Ayarbe, which teaches a lesson on honesty that the little prince learned when cutting by accident the king's favorite apple tree; and La pinteta d'or [The golden comb], by Marinel·lo with music by Modest Serra, telling the story of a shepherd arriving to the king's castle on a stormy night to return the princess' golden comb.

The stories that the repertoire was based on were also populated by kings, princesses, counts, and other figures from medieval nobility associated with the Catalan territories: the famous Count Arnau of Mataplana, Princess Margarida and the Baron of Lleida, the Counts of Barcelona visiting friar Garí, the Prince of England as one of the three drummers passing through the county of Granastre, Count Carles of Aragon, the Lady of Aragon (daughter of the King of France and sister of the King of Aragon), etc. In several cases, they are also shown as judicial decision-makers: the Count of Barcelona condemns or pardons friar Garí, the Baron of Lleida decides on the death sentences of prisoners...

In addition to the backdrops and stage sets that replicated palaces and castles on stage, especially Lluís Graner in the role of producer paid close attention to the costumes. Dresses were commissioned to replicate the royal noble attire and the armor of the medieval soldiers who defended them, made from the finest materials and with delicate details. For instance, in El fill del rei [The king's son], which stages the folk song of the same name arranged by Manuel Marinel·lo and Amadeu Argelaga, although the nationality of the prince is not mentioned, he appears in the last scene along with his knights dressed with the Saint George's cross on their shields ready to depart to the crusades after her lover is forced to be confined in a convent. Considering Saint George is Catalonia's patron saint, their armors and shields become a reference of another symbol linked to Catalan identity.

These stories, which were passed down orally from generation to generation over the centuries, include aristocratic figures such as the leaders of territorial power, which take on new symbolic value in the context of a national awakening. Through them, musical visions seek to disseminate in a mass cultural format the past existence of an administration and noble titles specific to the Crown of Aragon and the Catalan counties, who were executors of their own justice. They also publicly claim the use of a centuries-old language that serves as a unifying element between that past and the present, as a continuation of the national identity throughout time and its legitimate present existence. In other words, the points that Prat de la Riba highlighted as indispensable for a people to be considered a nation: their own language and legislation[549].

Companies dedicated to musical visions were not explicitly political, a point emphasized, for example, by Lluís Graner in relation to the Board of the Hospital de la Santa Creu, owner of the Principal theater:

[549] PRAT DE LA RIBA, Enric (1990 [1906]): La nacionalitat catalana, op. cit., p. 49.

> "[…] Among the renovations I am carrying out on the Principal theater, which I have leased, and as a complement to the decoration of its façade, I plan to place a Catalan flag at the top of the building. In doing so, I do not in any way intend to give the slightest hint of political nature to my company, which is purely artistic and educational. […][550]"

Therefore, justifying the entire dramaturgical construct of his repertoire exclusively through aesthetic theory and artistic references to medievalist Symbolism and folk culture was a decisive point. Medievalism was already present in the very content of the folklore being glossed, but it also fitted in perfectly with the artistic pretensions of the genre's ideologues and artistic directors. In fact, medievalist aesthetics were characteristic of Symbolist theater, which was imported to modernize the Catalan theater scene during the Modernist period of early 20th century[551]. It should be noted that Maeterlinck's Symbolist works were one of the direct dramaturgical inspirations for the genre as conceived by Adrià Gual, who had already adapted Pelléas et Mélisande (1893) in his own Nocturn (1896)[552].

However, Graner's Catalan nationalist activism was evident and ultimately showed his ideological affiliations. The selection of folklore to be glossed was not merely artistic either, since the dissemination on stage of the values and symbols implicit in this folklore can be directly related to the Catalan nationalist program that was actively promoted during those years. Among the artists and intellectuals involved in musical visions (especially the younger ones), there were openly "humble followers of the great Prat de la Riba[553]", as Emili Vallès described, for instance, Rafael Masó (promoter of the genre in Girona). Masó even received direct support from Prat de la Riba through the Barcelona Provincial Council for subsequent cultural projects such as the Athenea society[554].

The Catalanist movements that emerged to lay the foundations for a national art based on popular culture and traditional crafts —as Joaquim Folch i Torres explains when defending the opening of a Popular Arts Museum— were inspired by or saw their own aspirations directly reflected in Prat de la Riba, whose ideas were framed within the European nationalist currents that sought to find the defining elements of their identities in the popular folk arts[555]:

> "[…] this work as a whole must be the development of that section of Prat de la Riba's book, where, in order to demonstrate the existence of the Catalan nationality, the facts of art, as well as those of language and law, are brought to bear[556]."

As a result, Prat de la Riba's nationalist theory ended up becoming the ideological benchmark for Catalan nationalism at the time, which had an impact on and was directly followed by cultural activists involved in the production of musical visions.

Although he had been advocating these ideas since the Compendi de la doctrina catalanista [Compendium of Catalanist doctrine] of 1894, following the thinking reflected in La nacionalitat catalana [Catalan nationality] (1906), which would serve as a reference manual for Catalanism from then on, Prat de la Riba theorized that a cultural identity could be constituted as national if it had its own common language and a distinct legal tradition or rights:

> "If to be a country, to be a nation meant having a language, a legal conception, a distinctive sense of art, if it meant having a national spirit, character, and thought, then the existence of the nation or country would be a natural fact like the existence of a man, independent of the rights that might be recognized to it[557]."

These two aspects will be reinforced by musical visions, giving the quotation of folklore an ideological value and taking it to a symbolic level. The aforementioned permanent medievalist aesthetics led the audience to place language and territorial nobility in an idealized and mythologized historical past. The use of the Catalan language with notable archaic stylistic features —already revived by the Renaixença generation of writers— acts as a connector between past and present through the common language, highlighting its centuries of tradition. The noble titles and constant references to the Crown of Aragon also emphasize the monarchic legislative tradition of the former kingdom before its integration into the Castilian system, in line with the imperialist positions of Prat de la Riba himself, as opposed to other tendencies within Catalan nationalism that favored republicanism.

Musical visions, therefore, will play a role in the "nationalization" of the working classes and in the dissemination of the nationalist theory of Catalanism. At this time, one of the greatest concerns for conservative Catalan society was the incoming of industrial workers from Spanish-speaking regions and the loss of traditional culture due to the popularity of new imported genres[558]. In other words, the new working classes brought and favored Spanish as the common language in the city, and zarzuela, revue, and other variety shows replaced traditional genres. For this reason, the aimed audience of musical visions promoters were the working classes, especially children and families, in order to maintain the transmission of rural folklore and the Catalan language in urban areas.

The low ticket prices to facilitate the attendance of the working class, special days dedicated to children with offers and raffles, the inclusion of comedy films as part of the sessions, and the use of spectacular visual effects... all of this is aimed at attracting low- and middle-class audience through shows that have been modernized to reflect new trends of the incipient 20th century, while also maintaining traditional content and censored moral values. In addition, many of the works would include the direct participation of children as actors, usually in sardana dance numbers, thus exercising direct activism by teaching children traditional folk dance, not only as spectators but also as participants.

- Biblical episodes and religious characters

In addition to the folk quotations, it is worth noting the presence of religious references and the staging of biblical episodes in the repertoire of musical visions. In cases where musical visions correspond directly to biblical episodes, these come directly from sacred texts, understood as part of Catalan popular culture, which was the main creative source for musical visions. Some cases show episodes directly related to the life and work of Jesus Christ, such as the two versions of La resurrecció de Llàtzer (one by Guimerà and Morera and the other by Josep Carner and Joan Borràs de Palau) or L'oració a l'hort [The prayer in the garden] and El calvari [The calvary] (both with text adapted by Josep Carner and screened in film version at the Mercè hall during Lent). As well, Jesús a l'hort [Jesus at the garden], produced by Francisco Cuixart at the Montserrat hall in Manresa, staged this Lend topic.

Others will deal with other characters from sacred mythology based on texts from the Old Testament, such as Moisès [Moses], a vision written by Lluís Viladot and Joan Fargas for the Mercè hall. As well, the character of Jacob was the subject of Somni de Jacob (by Mateu Nonell and Adrià Esquerrà) for the Mercè hall and repeated at the Ars-Lucis hall, and Els fills de Jacob (by Antoni Doltra and Josep Rufet) for the Centre Catòlic d'Olot. The duo of Viladot and Fargas even wrote La tornada del fill pròdig [The return of the prodigal son] based on the parable of the same name. The case of La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta... by Josep Carner and Joan B. Lambert, although not directly based on a biblical text, deals with the sacred character of the Virgin Mary.

At a crossroads between religious and popular references, we find visions based on various figures from the book of saints and their miracles: Sant Ramon (by Folch i Torres and Piqué) staged at the Mercè hall, El miracle de Sant Francesc [Saint Francis's miracle] (written by Marc Miravitllas and Nicanor Pérez in 1927), and Lo captiveri d'un sant [A saint's captivity] (by G. Puig and Joan B. Lambert, on the story of Saint Vincenç de Paul) premiered at the Casa de Caritat in Barcelona. There are many others that even refer to places of significance to the Catalan Church, such as Montserrat (by Folch i Torres and Joaquim Grant) and Fra Garí (by Xavier Viura and Morera). Based on the poem La mort de l'escolà by Jacint Verdaguer, which also sets its story in Montserrat, a version will stage Antoni Nicolau's song based on Verdaguer's poem at the Mercè hall, which will be repeated in various halls of the musical visions network, and an alternative version entitled La mort de l'escolanet, written by Marc Miravitllas, adapting the same text by Verdaguer for the Euterpe hall in Manresa.

Nevertheless, the most popular religious episode that was used as a creative source for musical visions was Christmas and the traditions and biblical episodes surrounding the birth of Jesus, like the Three Wise Men visit. La nit de Nadal (staging of Francesc Casas's poem with music by Joan Lamote de Grignon), put on the stage of Barcelona's Principal theater the story of Jesus's birth as narrated in the Bible. The first scene shows on stage the manger where Jesus is born with the typical elements of the Nativity scene, and the following ones consist of angels announcing his birth, the shepherd dancing a sardana, and the arrival of the Three Wise Men to adore the newborn child.

As well, many smaller-scale productions in the network of musical visions halls staged Christmas scenes: from Morera's aforementioned El mal rabadà to Jesús és nat [Jesus is born] by Rafael Nogueras Oller and Joaquim Grant at the Mercè hall; Camí de Betlem [The way to Bethlehem] presenting "Christmas scenes of rustic country life" at the Ars-Lucis hall; Nadal a muntanya [Christmas on the mountains] by Ramon Garriga and Joan B. Lambert at the Imperi hall; and L'infant Jesús o Els pastorets de Betlem [Child Jesus or Bethlehem's shepherd] at the Montserrat hall in Manresa.

As well, multiple musical visions staged stories around the arrival of the Three Wise Men visiting children to bring them gifts: Un zing-zing, un té-té, una R i una E by Rafael Nogueras Oller and Frederic Alfonso at the Mercè hall, reprised also at the Ars-Lucis hall; Rondalla de Reis [Fable of the Three Kings] by Agustín Mundet and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, scheduled at the Imperi hall just before its closure; Diada de reis [The Kings' Eve] by Ramón Dámaso García and Iscle Tomàs at the Montserrat hall in Manresa, reprised at the Euterpe hall of the same city; Nit de reis [Kings' Eve] by Francisco de Prats, taking musical fragments by Schütt at the Montserrat hall in Arenys de Mar; La visió del frare Lleonart o Els reis d'Orient [Friar Lleonart's vision or The Kings from the East] by Ramon Pàmies and Pere Solé at the Centre Catòlic in Balmes; or even Los Reis [The Kings] by Viladot and Fargas. All these musical visions staged the arrival of the Three Wise Men, mostly bringing gifts to humble kids from poor families as a lesson of generosity and hope for the kids in the audience.

Some, although not directly dealing with religious figures, included secondary elements referring to Catholicism. In the case of the fable La nina dormida al bosc, arranged by Manuel de Montoliu with music by Frederic Alfonso, we see a Catholic ritual attended by priests taking place inside the palace to celebrate the birth of the heiress, as well as a Catholic cross among the ruins of the palace in the second act. Another work in which a Catholic rite is depicted on stage is El miracle del Tallat. After an opening scene in the port of Algiers, where Muslim pirates are seen bringing in the new Christian slaves they have captured, the Catalan slave Miró is rescued from his cell by an angel who takes him to the top of mount Tallat. There, while a group of pilgrims march towards the sanctuary in said mount, the priests are seen on stage officiating the Christian rite at the altar.

Similarly, Captiveri d'un sant (of which the music by Joan B. Lambert has been preserved) and La filla del carmesí [The Crimson Lord's daughter] (with music by Amadeu Argelaga) also deal with the theme of Christians being kidnapped by Muslim pirates. All of them include musical numbers of prayers to Allah to emphasize the religious nature of the events, beyond simple exotic orientalism. This theme, which also recurs in Guimerà's plays from the Renaixença period, serves as a form of national self-recognition of Christian Catalonia in contrast to the "other" identified in the Muslim pirate.

This review shows that religious references were practically omnipresent in the repertoire, whether explicitly and directly commenting on biblical texts, through secondary references to religious figures such as saints or friars, or by setting the action in places of worship such as Montserrat. However, we must emphasize the modernity of these productions, which sought to renew popular interest in this folkloric or religious mythology and attract the working classes through their spectacular staging. In the case of visions with religious content, electric light plays a particularly important role.

In the early years of the 20th century, electric lighting was a cutting-edge feature in theater. In fact, venues dedicated to musical visions had to make significant investments to electrify their facilities and install the rows of colored light bulbs needed to create these effects. The interplay of intensities, color mixtures and transitions, as well as silhouette drawing using shadows, were techniques that proved very attractive to audiences. But light was also an element imbued with symbolic value for vitalist Catholicism.

As is evident in the writings and reviews dedicated to La matinada, a work written by Adrià Gual and Felip Pedrell based on the original idea by Lluís Graner that recreates dawn through the gradual lighting of the stage, light is synonymous with new life, with waking up to the Lord's gift of a new day, with a spiritual awakening that leads us back to the right path:

> "[...] The poetic sentiment of the dawn of a new day, of the rising of the sun, inspired Pedrell to compose music of an almost mystical nature: it is the song of the multitude giving thanks to God for sending us the star of light and life. It is a hymn in which the decrepit old and the children, the maidens and the mothers sing of the benevolent deeds of the sun. [...][559]"

Beyond being a technical innovation, works such as La matinada present a totally avant-gardist dramaturgical conception of theater. The driving force behind the development of the action is no longer the word. The play breaks away from the primacy of the literary text in the theatrical tradition, which becomes a mere lyrical accompaniment, while the stage lighting is the element that holds the communicative potential of the piece. Light is a symbol of purity, rebirth and, in spiritual terms, divine illumination; moreover, the only action that takes place on stage is the dawn, which is recreated through light increasing its intensity. Therefore, the communicative potential of the work to create its message is totally interdisciplinary and depends especially on light. It is the interrelation of the dawn seen on stage with the choral piece and its lyrics as a prayer to God that, together, create the atmosphere of devotion to God and gratitude for his work in creating nature in which to redeem ourselves through manual labor in the fields.

[559] Revista musical catalana 23 (November 1905), p. 218 [originally in Catalan].

Similarly, Flors de muntanya [Mountain flowers], written by Joaquim Vancells and also described as a "vision of nature" to be premiered at his Ars-Lucis hall, makes special use of lighting design to recreate the passing of the day within the piece. From the dawn of the first scene to the midday sun among the trees in the second, and the dusk in the final scene. A large part of the work's appeal lies in the visual exploration of recreating different moments of the day on the same backdrop using only changes in lighting. The piece also focuses on showing the values of working in nature of two shepherd boys, but it has a more dramatic ending in which one of them, after shirking his responsibilities and losing one of the oxes in his herd, decides to entrust himself to God as his only redemptive penance and leaves amid the ringing of bells and the singing of the Angelus heard from the nearby church, entering into the darkness of the night. This time, it is darkness that has great symbolic value as a reflection of the character's inner self.

The appearance of sacred characters enveloped in flashes of white light, such as the Virgin Mary in La mare de Déu quan era xiqueta... and the rescuing angel in Lo miracle del Tallat, or even the daughters of count Arnau in the play of the same name as a representation of the purity that expels evil from the condemned count, are cases that combine these two concepts of the use of lighting. But, as well as heavenly beings and holy characters appear in musical visions, evil creatures from hell are also present as their counterparts.

Demons are recurrent characters in musical visions, often tempting the main characters or scaring them before the angels appear to rescue them. For instance, in L'oració de la nit [The night prayer], written by Rafael Masó, the lost children in the woods are threatened by a group of little demons when the sun sets, but their night prayer summons an angel that appears to rescue them. As well, in El mal rabadà, a court of little demons sing about boycotting the day in which Jesus is born, and the head of the demons tries to trick a shepherd in his way to Bethlehem before an angel appears to reveal his true identity.

In Fra Garí, the Devil also appears in the second scene, tempting Garí to murder the Count's daughter and helping him dig her grave. This time his court will be made up of witches and sorcerers, who are the ones in charge of summoning the Devil with a ritual dance. In El pont del diable [The devil's bridge], written by Antoni Doltra and Josep Rufet for the Centre Catòlic d'Olot, the main character also establishes a deal with the Devil to build him a bridge in exchange of his soul, although he eventually manages to trick him.

In some musical visions, there are also scenes taking place directly in hell. In El mal ric, the first scene stages the story narrated in the eponymous folk song that is sung during the play, in which a poor pilgrim dies of hunger after a rich man he encounters on his way doesn't want to provide him with any charity. The following two scenes present the gates of heaven, where the pilgrim is received by an archangels' choir, and hell, where the bad rich man ends up, while a group of little demons sing and dance.

Other pieces produced by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, even if they were closer to the genre of lyric drama or musical comedy, also maintained these elements in their imaginary, building on stage, for instance, Pere Botero's cauldrons in the eponymous production of Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, based on the figure from Catalan folklore that inhabits hell and boils people in his cauldrons.

These works ultimately served to modernize religious culture and bring it up to date with the modernity of the emerging 20th century, but in a censored and moralistic manner. This was, in fact, one of the goals pursued especially during the papacy of Pius X (1903–1914). Defenders of this lyrical genre and the film screenings that accompanied the sessions even referred to the pope's stance on cinema in the press, since the Church had begun to promote this type of entertainment under his rule. They held meetings of moral entrepreneurs, screening sessions at the Vatican, and even created cinematographic distribution companies linked to the Catholic institution.

For the promoters of the genre, Catalan identity was intrinsically Catholic, and national sentiment was inseparable from religious sentiment. Therefore, it was entirely natural for them to alternate religious scenes about local saints or biblical miracles with medieval episodes from rural folklore, since both belonged equally to the national culture. This conception is inherited from the mythology of Jacint Verdaguer, several texts of whom were adapted as musical visions, and would be directly influenced by the thinking of Torras i Bages, with whom Lluís Graner had come into direct contact through the Cercle Artístic de Sant Lluc [Artists' Circle of Saint Lluc] when Torras i Bages was its advisor[560].

The main promoters and collaborators involved in the production of musical visions — from Graner and Gual to Antoni Gaudí (architect of the Mercè hall), Joaquim Vancells (founder of the Ars-Lucis hall), and Modest Urgell (stage director of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner)— had contact with this artistic association, which had a strong Catholic character. Therefore, not only did they share the Catholic ideology of the circle, but this could also have been one of their main links or meeting places in the gestation of the project.

Returning to the role of bishop Torras i Bages, by this time he had already published the key piece of his philosophy, La tradició catalana (1892), in which he promoted the indivisibility of religion and Catalan nationality under the well-known slogan "Catalunya serà cristiana o no serà" [Catalonia will be Christian or it will not be]. This approach was partly a method of protection and legitimization in the face of the secularizing liberalism that was gaining ground[561], and its influence can be clearly traced among the promoters and sponsors of musical visions. For instance, Rafael Masó (architect and artistic director of the Saló Gerió) and Josep Carner (dramatic adapter on a fixed salary for the texts of the Mercè hall and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner) began publishing in Torras i Bages's journal Montserrat already in a very early stage of their careers[562].

These shows would be contributing to the dissemination of symbols created around Catholic Catalanism and promoting patriotic unity around religious milestones. This, added to the clear intention of their promoters to offer low-priced tickets and locate their venues in urban areas to facilitate attendance by the working classes, makes it clear that the aim was to tackle the "cuestión social" or "social issue" of the time through instruction in religious and nationalist values, while at the same time positioning the Church as an indispensable institution for the integrity of Catalan cultural identity[563].

> "The artist Graner, in putting into practice his great idea of exhibiting plastic and musical tableaux under the name of Espectacles i Audicions [Shows and Listenings], apparently set himself several goals, among them the moralization of "Theater", since we had reached an extreme where immorality and bad habits had completely invaded the stage in the most blatant way. He has achieved this, as his theater presents performances that exemplify all virtues, which he has done very well. It is a pity that he does not offer sessions exclusively for the working class at greatly reduced prices, in competition with the immoral theaters, which we have no doubt would be very well attended and where the worker would be moralized and enlightened at the same time[564]."

The project's ties to religious institutions will be quite evident, despite not being official. For instance, the first venue dedicated to musical visions, the Mercè hall, had a high-profile opening ceremony attended by notable figures from the ecclesiastical world, which caused reluctance among sectors less sympathetic to clericalism, as well as among anti-Catalan clergy:

> "Mr. Graner's gracious invitation was matched by his select audience. We were there, the cream of Barcelona's Catholicism, many distinguished Roman Catholic ladies and about a dozen most reverend priests. […] The Mercè hall begins, on this side, with all kinds of religious guarantees, which reassures me in the event of a fire inside […] those who could not escape would have the consolation of dying warm, passing quickly from this miserable life to the lofty regions from whence the angels descend. […][565]"

> "[...] In any case, the Mercè Hall is a curiosity in Barcelona, and because of its modest admission fee it's within reach of every purse. I don't know if, given its religious character, some prelate will be on hand to grant indulgences to those who visit.
> What I do know, because I saw it, is that on the day of the inauguration, a lady, upon leaving, was rushing around looking for the basin of holy water[566]."

In addition to its morally appropriate musical visions, the film screenings at the Mercè hall were the only ones in the city that had the approval of the ecclesiastical censors for clergy to attend its screenings. For its part, the Saló Gerió, designed in Girona by Rafael Masó, was directly linked to the Centre Moral Gironí [Girona's Moral Center] as it was installed in its building. Similarly, the Saló Artístic in Sabadell was installed in the building of the Associació de Catòlics [Association of Catholics] of Sabadell, and the Saló Montserrat was installed in the premises of the Centre Catòlic [Catholic Centre] of Arenys de Mar. In addition, the season of musical visions promoted by the priest Antoni Doltra in Olot was produced directly by the Centre Catòlic of Olot. As Doltra's case already shows, several priests and chaplains were among the authors of musical visions, making the religious activism of the project evident. As well, religious newspapers served as an important means of publicity to advertise musical visions.

❖ Musical dramaturgy of musical visions

The first point to be considered when designing the insertion of music within the piece was its alternation with spoken parts. From a dramaturgist point of view, both playwrights like Adrià Gual and composers like Enric Morera agreed that musical visions should have spoken sections in contrast with the lyrical sung parts in order to make the flow of the piece more fluid and flexible. However, the musical parts should not be enclosed in musical numbers that unrealistically started all of a sudden interrupting the action, as it usually happened in genres like Spanish zarzuela and generally in operetta.

Instead, they opted for an extended use of melodrama, in which usually instrumental parts (either only musical or accompanying spoken declamation) served as transitions from spoken action leading towards sung parts. As well, instrumental parts were used between sung sections or as de-transitions back to spoken action. The primacy was for the action to continue naturally whether it was sung or not, with music and singing serving as a lyrical element reinforcing the mood of the scene and the creation of the proper ambience, rather than sectioning the development of the play in fragmented numbers. Therefore, throughout a scene, instrumental, sung and spoken parts would fluidly alternate with each other.

As well, each scene would usually be based on the repetition and variation of the same musical motif or melodic sentence, providing it with a sense of unity. Thus, there is no internal structural division inside each scene caused by the insertion of music, but rather a lyric flow that integrates music instead of fragmenting the scene's structure. The dramaturgical conception is not based on a musical number with its reprises but a natural call for sung moments as the lyrism of the scene demands. The scene's motif or main melodic sentence will appear and reappear as the intensity and poetic feeling of the scene requires, played by one set of instruments, changing to another, or sung by one or multiple characters, providing each scene with musical cohesion.

We can see this fluid use of music, for instance, in the first scene of Fra Garí, composed by Enric Morera on Xavier Viura's text. After the presentation of the main melodic sentence played by the wind instruments, a short choral section sung by angels and demons follows, after which the main melody is reprised by the wind instruments. Then, damsels and chevaliers intervene with sung declamations about the state of the count's daughter, followed by an instrumental section in which the strings reprise and repeat one of the main motifs while the count and Garí speak above the music. A harmonic shift will change the atmosphere of the scene, turning it more dramatic by the end of their conversation. A reprise of the damsels' intervention will lead to an instrumental end of the scene in which the main melody is reprised by the wind instruments. An outline of the scene would show its structure as:

Section	Score bars	Libretto verses	Interventions
Instrumental prelude	1–16		String playing chords. Woodwinds playing the melody.
Angels and demons' choir tempting Garí while the curtain is still closed	17–35	1–10	Choir of angels and demons taking the melody from the winds. Strings continue playing chords.
Opening of the curtain. Garí is seen at his cave while he hears the trumpets of the count's court approaching	36–51		The melody goes back to the woodwind instruments, adding the horn. Strings continue playing chords.
Damsels and chevaliers lament on the state of the count's daughter	52–74	11–17	Damsels and chevaliers' choir. Strings start playing shorter chords.
The count and his sick daughter arrive to the scene	75–86		Winds continue playing melodic content and the main motif is introduced on the strings.
Spoken dialog between the count and Garí with instrumental music, agreeing that she will stay with Garí to recover	87–133	18–51	Count and Garí speak. Shortly countess and daughter by the end. Strings repeat the main motif softly under the spoken dialog.
Damsels' reprise of the lamentation	134–139	52–53	Damsels choir. Short chords played by the woodwinds.
Instrumental end of the scene reprising the main melody while the count's daughter follows Garí inside his cave	140–167		Brass instruments reprising the main motif [140–147], woodwind instruments and strings reprising the main melody from the opening [148–167].

The form of the scene depends then on the natural development of the action taking place, with characters following a realistic approach in the declamation of their parts. Music accompanies the events but does not affect the formal structure. There are no forced repetitions of text lines, choruses or any parts of the scene forced by musical form. Given that there are not repeated sections, what provides the internal musical cohesion of the scene is the constant repetition of the single main motif and its textural and harmonic variations throughout the scene. The sung parts do not alter either the rhythm of the action like enclosed musical numbers do. Instead, the development of the scene is fluid, searching for dramatic verisimilitude, which was one of their dramaturgical principles. This aim to reach lyric verisimilitude leads to the conception of a fantastic or mythological realism.

Following a verisimilar approach to the characters that sing and in which occasions, it is mostly the fantastic characters (angels, demons, or mythological creatures) those who sing their interventions, while human characters will mostly sing in situations in which singing can be realistically introduced in the actions they're performing (celebrations, dances, expressions of lament, working and hunting songs, and sung prayers). For instance, in the commented scene from Fra Garí, the fantastic angels and demons are the ones that sing their dialog, while Garí and the count's family speak above instrumental music. The sung interventions of the damsels and chevaliers correspond to a deep expression of lament, and part of the instrumental music is justified as verisimilar in the scene as the trumpet call from the court, who plays the scene's main motif. In the second scene of Fra Garí, demons and witches will sing during a evil dance (also including a spoken melodrama section), and in the third scene the count's chevaliers will sing in the context of a hunting song.

Considering examples from other venues, El bon escarceller from the Mercè hall includes two musical numbers written by Joan B. Lambert that are also inserted as verisimilar music. The ballad is sung by the imprisoned count as a lament, which the jailer intentionally mentions that he has heard and whose sentiment has touched him, while the sardana is sung and danced by the kids while paying outside the jail, which the count hears from his cell. From the Ars-Lucis hall, Flors de muntanya introduces a folk song that the shepherd kids sing as an entertainment while they work in the fields and includes religious music at the end that is actually played in the story from the nearby town's church. As well, in L'oració de la nit from the Gerió hall, the sung moments are played by the little demons and the angel, while the kids speak part of their dialogue above music that includes sounds references from the environment where the action is taking place, like the cuckoo bird from the woods. The only part they sing from their intervention is the night prayer, which could verisimilarly be recited as a song.

As well, it is worth noting the usual choral singing in musical visions and their hidden interventions behind curtains or from the stage sides. In pieces like La matinada we can also appreciate how the placement of choirs is used to create spatial acoustic designs as a relevant element in the conceptualization of the piece. In this piece, Felip Pedrell starts indicating that the first intervention of the choir is heard from far away, singing with their mouths closed. Slowly, as the music goes on, they should get closer to the stage, open their mouths to sing proper lyrics, and raise their voices little by little. Eventually, the characters from the choir will appear on stage and reach a forte. In the aforementioned scene from Fra Garí, the choir of angels and demons also takes place behind the stage, indicating on the score that the demons should be heard from further away than the angels. As well, the damsels will start singing out of stage and will approach it slowly as the court arrives to Garí's cave after the trumpet call. In the second scene, the witches and demons that arrive to Garí's cave also start their choral singing outside of the scene and heard from far away. They will sound closer and closer until they arrive at the stage and start an evil dance number. The angel's apparition that makes them run away will follow the same procedure.

The spatial sonorization of the backstage singers is also remarkable in El miracle del Tallat, composed by Enric Morera. In the second scene, which takes place in Miró's cell, the Muslim pirates are heard singing their prayer to Allah. Different singers will sing a musical sentence of the prayer, but they will be on different sides of the backstage, creating a binaural effect until they all join in a conjunct choir also rising in intensity. Similarly, in the third scene of the piece, the choir of angels that rescue the Christian captive also start singing from the backstage, sopranos singing one sentence from one side and tenors continuing from the opposite side, while they approach the stage and eventually appear visible to the audience. The later intervention of the pilgrims approaching the sanctuary where the angels leave the rescued captive will follow the same procedure.

Lastly, it's worth mentioning the case of La presó de Lleida, written by Adrià Gual with music by Jaume Pahissa. In this case, music does not announce the upcoming character that still has not been seen on stage but rather recalls him once the audience has been moved to a different location. The first scene of the play shows the prison of Lleida to the audience, where the thieves are singing a song. When the stage set is changed for the second scene that takes place in the baron's palace, we can still hear their song from the nearby prison, but this time the prisoners are out of the stage. Instead of announcing the appearance of the characters with a faraway singing, this time it's the audience who has been moved further from the original location, and the spatialization of their singing is used as a tool for the audience to understand the spatial movement to a nearby hall where they can still be heard. Therefore, the musical announcement of characters that start singing out of the stage before reaching it, the singing of backstage characters that are not visible to the audience, or moving to backstage characters that have already been on stage while they continue singing are common dramaturgical procedures in musical visions used by different authors.

- Glossing folk songs

As mentioned above, one of the sources of melodic inspiration for the musical visions will be Catalan folk songs. One of the basic compositional principles of the musical visions based on the staging of folk songs will be to respect and maintain the original melodic design and to ensure that the folk motifs are the central axis of the composition. It will be based, rather than on developing new melodic material, on harmonizing, orchestrating, and glossing the original song. The example of Blancaflor discussed earlier in chapter 1 is already a case of glossing a traditional song. In this case, as well as in the rest of staged folk songs, the motifs that make up the melody of the traditional song are the main material for the music of the whole scenic piece.

The process of "glossing" traditional melodies will be based on these motifs being repeated indefinitely throughout the musical fragments of the scene, keeping the original melody recognizable at all times. The interest of the musical development will depend on the changes in the texture, orchestration, and rhythmic subdivision and arrangement of these melodies: the motifs will move from one instrument to another; they can be homophonic, or one of the sections will play harmonic accompaniment; tempo can vary and rhythm can be adjusted to adapt the melody to the incidental requirements of the scene.

One of the cases in which this procedure of glossing a folk song can be observed is in La mare de Déu quan era xiqueta..., orchestrated and arranged by Joan B. Lambert. In the first instrumental overture, the harp and viola play a harmonic role, constantly repeating arpeggiated chords, while the main motif of the song is repeated by different instruments. It is first played by the first violin and clarinets, then by the cellos and double basses, and then returns to the violin and clarinets, with the addition of the flute and oboe.

In the sung section, the child soprano will sing the entire popular melody slowly and softly, while the harp continues to play subtle arpeggios and the strings mark each half beat with a brief pizzicato. Next, a brief instrumental interlude will repeat the procedure of the initial overture. In the second strophe, the melody will be sung again by the soprano following a similar procedure to the first time. However, some instruments will occasionally double the voice and reprise the melody in the pauses between vocal phrases. This instrumental crescendo accompanying the voice will culminate when, at the end of the strophe, the orchestra takes up the melody again, building to a grand apotheosis as it accelerates and grows in intensity.

A similar approach can be heard in the musical vision A la voreta del mar, arranged by Adrià Esquerrà. In this case, the popular melody is repeated cyclically throughout the scene, sung by the two main characters, who alternate in the form of a versified dialogue. The popular melody follows the characteristics of note repetition, small movements, and an arched design. While the main melody is generally slow and elongates its notes, the internal rhythmic tension is created by the violin and cello, in the form of a counterpoint to the vocal melody with fast scales at moments when the voice pauses on longer syllables. For its part, the piano generally has a harmonic function, accompanying with chords.

However, to maintain musical interest and avoid monotony, and in response to the plot twist that takes place halfway through the piece, harmonic variations and an acceleration of tempo will be used to emphasize the tension and alarm created in the characters. While the start of second scene returns to the melodic and calm beginning of the first, towards the middle, it will once again feature harmonic chromaticism, tempo accelerations, and a more percussive character in the piano chords that reflect the evolution of the dialogue between the princess and the sailor, who has taken her away on his ship without her consent, until he reveals that he also comes from a noble family.

A last example worth mentioning that can also be found in volume V of this dissertation made of transcribed scores is Campaneta la ning-ning, with music composed by Joaquim Grant after a libretto written by Rafael Nogueras Oller. The music for this musical vision is divided into three numbers and a short finale, with spoken parts in between numbers and their encores. Numbers 1 and 2 follow a similar approach to the aforementioned examples: the folk melody is sung by the different characters, who repeat the same melodic sentence while instrumental texture varies throughout the numbers, ending with an instrumental section played by the strings in number 2 that serves for characters to speak over.

However, number 3 is worth mentioning because of the rhythmic adaptation of the folk melody. In this part of the scene, characters appear at a ball and incidental music is needed. To stick to the principle of only glossing the original song without added material or alternative melodies, motifs from the melody are taken to write an instrumental minuet for the dance played on stage and a march for the entrance of the prince. While the minuet rhythm and its form can be clearly recognizable, as well as the march rhythm and tempo, the use of the folk motif makes the original melody still noticeable and provides musical cohesion to the different musical numbers of the piece.

Many other musical visions followed similar procedures, glossing popular songs such as La presó de Lleida and Els tres tambors, written by Adrià Gual (who also wrote the libretto for L'estudiant de Vic); and El fill del rei by Manuel Marinel·lo with music by Amadeu Argelaga for the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. There are many others for which the score has not been located, although we know from reviews that they followed similar procedures, such as El mal ric, with music arranged by Frederic Alfonso, and Sant Ramon, with music arranged by Fructuós Piqué at the Sala Mercè, Muntanyes de Canigó with musical arrangement by Adrià Esquerrà for the Saló Gerió, and the version of La presó de Lleida by Jaume Bofarull with musical arrangement by Daniel Mestres.

- Topics of musical discourse

Besides the quotations and glosses of folk songs and the use of folk sardana rhythms, original music was also written. These were the cases of folk legends, myths and fables that did not have an existing folk melody associated with them. However, in this intentional detachment from melodism and the prevalence of original catchy melodies, the procedure for these cases was also standardized and music recurred to topics associated with the nature of the characters to semiotically and pedagogically complement the meaning and interpretation of their appearances.

For instance, nobiliary characters in staged legends and myths with original music will maintain the previously explained tendency of staged folk songs. Even if they are not directly quoting folk motifs, their singing will imitate and evoke folk-styled melodies or will include scenes of declaimed intonations over instrumental music replicating these folk-sounding motifs. Such is the case of the count's family and court in Fra Garí (which comes from a non-musical legend). In the following selected bars from the first scene, the narrow melodic range and the movements in narrow intervals usually in conjunct motion can be appreciated in the damsels' intervention:

Throughout the spoken part in which the count dialogues with Garí, the string instruments can also be appreciated repeating a segment of the main motif taken from the melodic sentence that opens the piece. Therefore, all the instrumental material played comes from variations of this initial melodic sentence, which follows the same design based on narrow and conjunct movements, often arched.

A similar imitation of folk topics can be appreciated in the ballad sung by the imprisoned count in El bon escarceller. Here, does not only the ballad that the count verisimilarly sings within the reality of the play imitate the same folk-styled melodic design, but literarily it also imitates the style of medieval ballads, explaining the epic content of his personal story in short strophes. In the selected transcribed bars, the same melodic style favoring conjunct movements to close notes is present, although some wider intervals including fifths and fourths can be seen as expressive elements in the count's lamentation. Still, the overall arched melodic design is maintained, as well as the alternation between binary and ternary rhythmic figuration characteristic of folk melodies.

These characters embody then the musical essence of Catalan folklore and traditional styles. They become representations not only of medieval historical nobility but also locate and legitimate folk style in their idealized medieval past, as a characteristic cultural feature in noble characters that has survived throughout the centuries. In contrast, evil creatures like demons and witches that appear on stage will follow a musical style influenced by urban contemporary music. Their evil acts are then musically linked to the moral corruption of modern cities.

Going back to the example of Fra Garí, the witches dance from the second scene presents the characteristic topical style of these characters. Tempo is notably faster, brass instruments have a relevant presence, and dynamics and intensity are forte, resulting in loud scenes. Rhythm is irregular, starting musical sentences in pickup beats and playing off time to remark the weak parts of each beat. Figures are repeated and short, staccato or accentuated, while instruments move down a fifth and go back up a fourth repeating those same two notes, breaking any melodic fluidity to reinforce the rhythmic character of the section.

Sometimes, this topical style is also mixed with folk-styled melodies sung by the little demons. Such is the case, for instance, of the first musical number of El mal rabadà, which glosses a Catalan Christmas folk song that the little demons dance on stage. The musical version for this scene includes the aforementioned offbeat technique in the instruments, the fast pace and overall rhythmic character given to the accompanying music, while respecting and making recognizable the folk melody when sung. A similar example can be found in the second musical number written for L'oració de la nit, in which the little demons go out on stage to scare and threaten the little kids (which will be commented in the section dedicated to the Saló Gerió in chapter 9).

Similarly, the Moor dance played in the first scene of El miracle del Tallat, which locates the action in the port of Algiers, follows a similar style, aimed at helping the audience locate the Moors in their imaginary of the evil, in contrast with the upcoming angel's apparition to rescue the captive Christian. Lower strings and bassoons play accentuated off beat chords, generating a rhythmic feeling, while first violins and clarinets play the melodic line, which is made of fast trills and short scales including incidental alterations, recreating an orientalist style. As the dance goes on, the lower strings and additional woodwind instruments join the melody creating a loud and fast homophony; as well, brass instruments will take over the offbeat rhythmic marking.

As just mentioned, demonic musical topics will be in direct contrast to the style used to musically introduce angels and heavenly creatures. These often appear right after evil beings appear on stage threatening the main characters, usually accompanied by a harmonious homophony inspired by religious music. In the final intervention of the "good angel" in L'oració de la nit the rhythm and tempo slow down, the piano plays arpeggiated chords and the voice and strings play the same melody made of longer notes in a piano dynamic, following arched melodic sentences. In contrast with the previous demons, which presented rhythmic and fast music, the angel's song is melodic and harmonious.

In other cases, religious moments have a more apotheotic nature. In the second scene of El miracle del Tallat, the heavenly topic can be heard when the choir of angels arrives to rescue the captive Christian. Following the previous example, all voices will be homophonic, singing legato long notes. The choral melody will prevail over the instrumental accompaniment, which will be based on stable, repeated and homorhythmically played chords. However, the figuration of these chords will accelerate throughout the scene and long chords will be broken up in repeated shorter notes. This will create internal tension and a feeling of acceleration, while the main choral melody maintains the same slow tempo and rhythmic figuration. This inner rhythmic tension will continue in a crescendo until it reaches the apotheosis at the end of the scene and is resolved in a final long and sustained chord. Liturgical style is therefore associated with the savior heavenly characters that end up saving humans from evil.

Figure 150: Bars 142 to 148 for the voices and strings from the second scene of El miracle del Tallat*, corresponding to the angels' chorus.*

As also happened with the demons' musical topics, heavenly topics can be found in some cases combined with references to folk imagery. Such would be the case of La matinada, in which the liturgical style is used for the villagers that sing a choral piece to thank God for the new day during the sunrise. The homophonic general chorus following the heavenly musical topic is alternated with passages in which sections of villagers sing more folk-styled melodies, to later reprise the initial heavenly chorus. While the general chorus is mostly homophonic and holds slow and long melodic sentences, the folk-styled passages will be more rhythmic, faster and instruments will either play chords or rhythmically remark some melodic motifs, accompany the voices instead of doubling their melody.

This combination of musical topics intertwines thus the symbolic meaning of religious and liturgical prayer with references to folk culture. It depicts the performance of devotion in rural ambiences, as well as presenting the rural world as a divine creation and working in the fields as a moralizing task, combining both worlds also by mixing its musical topics into one single piece.

Although further analytical research would be necessary to properly address the musical semiotics of Catalan lyric theatre, this section aimed to draft a proposal of intuited musical topics that seem to be present and recurrent in musical visions, linked to characters from the imagery that define musical visions. Further edition and deeper analysis of the scores is encouraged in order to confirm the validity of the proposed topics, as well as to identify compositional techniques that are both characteristic of individual composers and the genre of musical visions as a whole.

This new genre aimed to stage traditional folk songs, legends and tales in a modern style to appeal to the urban audience of the newly inaugurated 20th century. Directly influenced by the Symbolism of Maeterlinckian art theater, the musical visions presented a brief format with a dramaturgy that moved beyond literary theater, integrating visual and sound elements in order to transcend dramatic action in favor of emotional and sensorial suggestion. Through the spectacular nature of the stage productions (featuring a wide variety of painted curtains, lighting effects, special scenic tricks, musical choirs and dances), musical visions were aimed at creating suggestive atmospheres or moods that would arouse emotions in the audience through the senses. However, the ultimate objective was to continue the generational transfer of popular oral folklore in the urban space, where it was now staged. If harmonized folk songs had been widely accepted in the choral repertoire by different layers of society, from workers' to elite choirs, bringing them now to the stage as a theatrical production was a logical step towards the creation of a national mass cultural product.

This process of staging was based on a series of intertextual and intermodal connections through which the producers intended to "visualize" orally transmitted folklore, hence the term “musical vision”. This way, urban society and especially children could continue consuming traditional folklore in a modern form able to compete with other contemporary productions, ensuring the continuity and transmission of traditional culture. The particular characteristics of musical visions made people perceive them as a genre of lyric theater that differed from others. While other nomenclatures like “lyric drama” or “operetta” were often diluted into the term “zarzuela” by the Catalan press and public opinion, “musical visions” were quite distinctive and eventually became the label used to refer to Symbolist theater in general. They probably were the model that most approached the movement’s goal of creating a distinctive and genuinely Catalan genre of lyric theater.

In addition to the artistic intention of connecting aesthetically with 20th-century modernity, musical visions were created as a tool to disseminate a Catalanist and Catholic ideological program as mass entertainment. The elements that make up the imagery of the musical visions are similar to those that make up the theoretical essence of Catalan identity and would have served to introduce the public to the cultural references on which conservative and Catholic Catalan nationalism was based.

The counts, kings, and princesses of popular folklore who appear on musical visions — framed in a medieval context that gives them timeless or ahistorical value— serve as symbols of the legislative tradition that Prat de la Riba considered necessary for a people to be considered a nation. In addition, there is the common language legitimized in the historical past by this same medievalism and the archaic characteristics of the used Catalan lexicon, as well as serving as a connecting element throughout time with the Catalan-speaking audience of the present. The sacred characters and places of worship that appear in the musical visions also have an ideological interpretation in terms of identity, linking Catalan nationality with Catholic sentiment as something intrinsic, following the doctrine of Torras i Bages. Therefore, we can talk about musical visions as a repertoire of lyrical theater based on the formal modernization of folklore and directly inspired by art theater and Symbolist dramaturgy. At the same time, it was a spectacle dedicated to the spread of nationalist ideology and the mass dissemination of the symbols that make up Catalan cultural identity according to the theories of the conservative and Catholic Catalanist sector.

Dramaturgically, it opted for a poetic and lyric flow between sung and spoken parts, using often instrumental parts as transitions. The scenes tended to be musically constructed on the variation of the same motif of melody, often taken from folk songs, that appeared and reappeared throughout the scene with textural variations on the instruments or voices playing it, as well as rhythmic and harmonic changes to adapt to the evolving mood of the scene. Besides folk quotations, the staging of legends and fables that didn’t count with traditional music accompaniment, new folk-styled melodies would be written following the same structural procedure. As well, some musical topics seem to be identifiable when characters such as demons and angels appear on stage, recurring to urban-styled references to represent evil and religious-sounding music when heavenly creatures appeared, while medieval characters would sing folk-styled intonations.

Section IV

Network of venues and promoters staging musical visions[567]

[567] This part of the dissertation is complemented by the catalogues on volumes II and III, which include detailed documented files, stage direction and press transcriptions, along with existing pictures of each of the musical visions premiered on each venue.

Chapter 8:
Musical visions venues in Barcelona under the sponsorship of Lluís Graner

The first venues dedicated to the performance of musical vision, the genre this section is dedicated to, were opened by painter Lluís Graner, who became in 1904 an entertainment impresario. Up until then, his main profession had been artistic painting. He studied Fine Ats at the Escola de Belles Arts of Barcelona between 1883 and 1886, taught by Benet Mercadé and Antoni Caba. With a scholarship given by the Barcelona Provincial Council, he went to study in Madrid, where he felt especially inspired by the painting he contemplated by Spanish Baroque painters Diego Velázquez, Francisco de Zurbarán and José de Ribera[568]. This experience deeply marked the beginnings of his career as a painter, strongly influenced by the chiaroscuro technique and the representation of social issues and low-class characters on his paintings[569]. His interest on "painting light" in chiaroscuro would later on translate into the experimentation with electric lighting on the shows he produced. As well, his first period as a painter influenced by Social realism would also translate into his personal concern of providing working classes with moral and artistic entertainment and attractions.

After also visiting Paris and studying Millet, Bastien-Lapage and the Le Nain brothers' paintings, he resettled in Barcelona in 1891, opening that same year his first whole exhibition at the Sala Parés. He became in 1895 the president of the Artists' Circle of Barcelona, role that he held for a year, in which he resolved the economic struggles of the institution. Nevertheless, in 1899 he joined the Artists' Circle of Saint Lluc, a split up of the aforementioned one formed by Catholic painters and spiritually led by priest Torres i Bages, whose teachings and call for action to provide a Catholic moral theater for the peoples surely sank in Graner's mind. As well, he was cofounder of the Artistic and Literary Society of Catalonia, along with Modest Urgell (who later on would become stage director for the 1906/07 season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner) and Enric Galwey[570].

Among his most renowned merits, it's worth pointing out his bronze medal at the Universal Exhibition of 1888 and the honorific mention at the 1889 edition. He also received the extraordinary award given by the queen at the General Exhibition of Fine Arts in 1894 for the painting La ferreria [The blacksmith's shop], the bronze medal at the edition of 1895 for La conjura [The conspiracy], another bronze for Remordiment [Remorse] in 1897, and a silver medal for El comité roig [The red committee] in 1901. Throughout the 1890s and 1900s, his work was exhibited throughout Germany, especially in Berlin, Munich and Düsseldorf. He was as well known in France, where he exhibited his work at the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts up until 1904, even invited to become a member of this French society[571].

Nevertheless, in 1901 the painter decided to start taking music lessons. As he wrote to his friend Felip Pedrell in January 15th, 1902, while the composer was residing in Madrid:

> "[…] You shall know, my dear teacher, that I too am beginning to study music (most certainly you are saying to yourself that I have gone mad). Well, yes, at the age of 38 I am just beginning, and with true faith. Naturally, I do not know how far I will get, but I can assure you that what all my friends tell me (that I will tire of it and soon give it up), that I will never do, for I feel too deeply the beauty of this art, perhaps the most difficult one, but also the most sublime. […][572]".

In following letters to Pedrell, Graner confirmed the continuation of his musical studies. However, from May on, Graner stated he was feeling too anxious to study music properly, since he was professionally struggling in the upcoming painting exhibition he was participating in. As he feared, his works did not receive a positive review by critics at the National Exhibition of Madrid in 1904 and the painter felt devastated, while, as he says, the desire to continue learning music lingered in his soul. By the end of June, the situation had not gotten any better, since his hopes that the State would buy some of his recent painting was neither fulfilled. At this point in his career, Graner was already recognized as a senior painter, with multiple national and international awards and featured in Spanish, French and German exhibitions. The fact that he was left with no recognition in this year's national exhibitions and that his painting were neither bought must have felt like a professional discredit.

This professional disappointment, along with his personal restlessness to get more involved in the musical field, seem to be the reason that caused Graner's professional shift from painting to entertainment and lyric theater production. However, it does not seem to be a sudden decision, not only because he had already been studying music for years, but also because during that same spring of 1904, Adrià Gual had been preparing under the sponsorship of Josep Carner the edition of his Blancaflor, the first "folk song harmonized for the stage", the genre that Graner would be interested in reviving in the upcoming season at his newly open Mercè hall. Therefore, rather than the cause, the failed exhibition seems to be rather the trigger or accelerator of this decision.

The first registered petition by Lluís Graner to habilitate and renovate the facilities where the Mercè hall would be dates back to June 13th, 1904. The venue would open in November 3rd of that same year, although new petitions to renovate the main entrance on the Rambla and the underground connection of the basement with the Bot street would be issued on January 1905, when the first plastic installation of the Nativity scene had already taken place[573]. Motivated by its success, in terms of public attending the venue, economic revenue and artistic productions, Graner presented a bet in the public competition to rent the Principal theater of Barcelona, where he opened his Espectacles-Audicions Graner in October, 1905.

As artistic director of these venues, Graner was free to experiment beyond traditional painting. He became a stage set designer and a pioneer in the artistic use and design of electric lighting on stage productions, becoming one of the main promoters of Symbolist theater in Catalonia along Adrià Gual. As well, he produced multiple comic and documentary movies for the Mercè hall, gaining the recognition of being the inventor of the "spoken films". His plastic installations at the underground grottos of the Mercè hall also allowed him to experiment with dioramas, reflections trick with lighting and all kinds of visual attractions.

His work at this recreational venue and the stage of the Principal theater gave him the chance to go further than only "painting light" to actually experimenting with it with live lighting on stage shows and plastic installations, combining different colors and intensities while projected on painted backdrops. This led Graner to become a referent in the modernization of plastic arts towards the achievement of a total work of art that would be connected at the same time with popular urban attractions. His example was followed by other painters like Joaquim Vancells, who opened the Ars-Lucis hall in Terrassa, and Francisco Cuixart, who opened the Montserrat hall in Manresa following the model initiated by Graner's Mercè hall.

The following sections of this chapter will develop Graner's experience as artistic director and theater impresario, from his beginnings in 1904 at the Mercè hall until his exile in 1910 after the bankruptcy caused by the economic mismanagement of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. The chapter will analyze and comment the different attractions installed at the venues, with a special focus on the lyric theater productions, and will remark the innovations he embraced on stage productions. As well, the economic planning and management of the venues will be analyzed to provide a documented explanation on his economic failure, given the evident success of productions like El comte l'Arnau, La presó de Lleida, La santa espina or La reina vella, which were not corresponded with equal economic gains.

Sala Mercè

The Mercè hall opened on November 3rd, 1904, as Lluís Graner's first project outside the field of painting and gallery exhibitions. It was located in 4 Rambla dels Estudis, which currently corresponds to 122 Rambla, one of the main streets in the heart of the city of Barcelona. It was named after the Saint patron of Barcelona, Saint Mercè or Mercedes, given the strong Catholic spirit of its new owner. The venue used the main floor of the building as well as the underground floor, and also enjoyed an access on the street behind the building at the Bot street, which was used as the exit of the venue. The architectonical design of the venue was in charge of renowned architect Antoni Gaudí (1852–1926).

Figure 155: Picture of the entrance to the Mercè hall from the Rambla. People are gathering to line up to enter the venue, whose sunshade says "teatre sala Mercè" or "Mercè hall theater". [Institut d'Estudis Fotogràfics de Catalunya].

Lluís Graner was its owner and artistic director throughout the whole period of activity, which reached 1910. The painter envisioned the venue as a multidisciplinary space dedicated to different entertainments and attractions, in an approach to modern urban culture. His aim was to provide a moral alternative to Catholic families, also affordable to middle- and low-class families, so they wouldn't have to attend other indecent venues that often used sexual jokes or movies to appeal the working classes. Since Graner's goal was to mainly attract children, Thursdays were dedicated to them and toys were given away in a raffle to children that had a ticket to the venue on that day.

The main floor hosted a small stage where musical visions would be performed, as well as a projection booth from which the films were screened. The program was scheduled as short continued sessions throughout afternoon and evening, usually from 16:00 to 19:30 and from 21:30 to 23:00. These would be longer on the weekends and holidays, also including a morning session. Tickets to a session were only 25 cents and these started with a series of projected films, ending up with the performance of a musical vision, usually by a troupe of kids and music played by a quintet made of a piano or harmonium, two violins, a viola and a cello. Sometimes, also remarkable pictures were projected and musical pieces were played. The business model of hourly sessions allowed to lower the entry prices, instead of paying a higher price for a longer session at a larger theater, attracting more people as well. As a parallel attraction, the underground floor would host plastic installations.

Graner's ideal was to imitate recreational halls, like the ones in Paris where the cinematographer and Georges Méliès fantastic films had become popular. He offered as well similar short-format entertainment at low prices, but providing a truly artistic and moral entertainment. Musical visions, using the very recent technology of electric light on stage and other stage effects, were an experimental genre aimed at materializing on stage the imagery from folklore and popular fables. The "spoken films" were also unique, even receiving Graner the recognition for their invention. Therefore, Graner's vision did not come straight from the field of theater, wanting to become a dramatic impresario, but rather from the field of urban entertainment and popular attractions.

The following sections will deepen on the different shows and attractions taking place at the venue, the difficulties that progressively forbid the stage and cinematographic activity at the Mercè hall, the departure of its acting company and its use after Graner's exile.

❖ Cinematograph

While the musical visions staged in this recreational venue were the main attraction of the sessions, it is also worth to acknowledge the cinematographic screenings that preceded these performances on the same stage. In fact, the Mercè hall was officially registered as a cinema and it even received a gold medal by the local authorities in recognition of the outstanding quality of its cinematographic screenings, qualified as the best movie hall in the urban center[574].

It is worth noting that cinematographic screenings had just become one of the latest attractions in recreational halls, initiating its spread across Parisian venues between 1898 and 1902. The Mercè hall installed them as soon as 1904 and, following the international trends of early cinema, screened programs based on comic films, fantastic tricks, religious topics and documentaries. As for the film repertoire screened at the hall, the Mercè hall had, for instance, the right for exclusive screening and distribution of some of the films produced by the Pathé house, which eventually opened an office in Barcelona in 1906[575].

In addition to acquiring films from prominent international film companies, like Pathé or Gaumont, the artistic team at the Mercè hall undertook the production of their own films during the first season, encompassing both documentary productions of popular events in the city and artistic depictions of dramatic plots. All of Graner's cinematographic offer was thought out as moral content suitable for children and families, while the majority of halls in the city did not.

In fact, across the Catholic world, the use of cinema as a moralizing tool spread throughout these years. Catholic film impresarios even achieved to organize a screening at the Vatican for the pope and the highest cardinals in 1907[576], proving how cinema (which had been initially criminalized by church as immoral) could become a powerful sociocultural tool to provide the masses with moral entertainment. Graner, who deeply shared this concern, joined the cause with his cinematographic program at the Mercè hall. His aim was to upgrade cinema from being a "minor" entertainment to a proper art.

From the team of script writers, only the names of Adrià Gual and Josep Carner are known[577]. Another relevant collaborator in Graner's cinematographic team was Segundo de Chomón (1871–1929). According to Adrià Gual's autobiography, he worked with Chomón between 1904 and 1905 during his period at the Mercè hall[578]. Nevertheless, there is no other mention of Chomón neither on the press nor on any other sources. Instead of being a permanent operator at the hall, Chomón would have probably acted as a commercial intermediary between Graner and the Pathé house[579], as well as cameramen consultant.

It's relevant to note that between 1902 and 1903 Chomón assisted Ferdinand Zecca as cameraman for the recording of La Vie et la passion de Jésus-Christ, produced by the Pathé house[580]. On the Easter of 1905, Graner premiered at the Mercè hall multiple films and cinematographic musical visions of his own production based on the same topic, recording very similar scenes and in need of recreating the same tricks, a task in which Chomón could have assisted them. These films were Judas (script written by Josep Carner, aired on March 8th), L'oració a l'hort [The prayer in the garden] (also with script by Josep Carner, accompanied by incidental music and with stage design for the recording made by Salvador Alarma, premiered on the same day), and El calvari [The calvary] (premiered on April 5th).

One of the main attractions from the Mercè hall were the "spoken films". During its first season, the hall produced its own short comic films and, during screenings, the actors delivered their lines aloud while hidden, synchronizing them with the visuals presented on screen [581]. This unique method that Graner pioneered was made possible by the actors' hidden presence in the hall, either positioned in the pit or behind the stage, contributing to an immersive auditory and visual experience for the audience.

Since the use and promotion of Catalan language was one of the main goals on the hall's policies, the invention of these "spoken films" was probably caused by the need to include language on the movies that, at this moment, were still silent. It was an ingenious and simple way to solve technological impediments, although it made the screenings more expensive to produce, as the salary of the actors hiding in the pit had to be paid. Graner obtained a patent for these shows as the city's first sound screenings through this particular technique.

As well, on the spring of 1905, the Mercè hall produced a series of films under the title Películes intimes de personatges catalans [Intimate films about Catalan personalities], which is worth noting for its innovative nature, showing again the pioneering approach that Graner had regarding cinematographic production. These films recorded well-known figures from Catalan cultural life and showed them to the public in their usual creative activities. Painters such as Modest Urgell, Ramon Casas, Santiago Rusiñol, and Lluís Graner himself were especially featured creating portraits or drawings.

Although the films seem to be lost, press reviews remark the "artistic character" of the recordings, "highlighting the face" of remarkable personalities, something the audience wasn't used to see:

> "[…] The eminent artist Luis Graner, who personally oversees the recording of the films, has chosen the backgrounds for the scenes, the moments captured by the photographs, and the speed of the screening with such skill that all the pictures are extremely interesting and expertly documented. […][582]".

As well, the camera did not remain in a fixed position, but also moved to capture the rest of the room full of art pieces:

> "[…] But the photographer, drawn to the many artistic elements in Casas' studio, tilts the camera and scans the room, allowing us to see the paintings and drawings collected there. Thus, in addition to the artist, we see in detail the place where such admirable works have been produced, works that have raised the prestige of Catalan painting both here and abroad.
> This method of showing the environments that inspire and produce our artists and writers is continued with the other models filmed, so that the vision is not only interesting for the curious, but also instructive for the observer. […][583]".

This was the case, for example, of the documentary movie Graner recorded of one of the rehearsals of the Orfeó Català, which used a large number of cameras not to miss any of the important faces that showed up on the event, like Felip Pedrell's or Lluís Millet's, both friends of Graner. However, mainstream film history does not document this kind the use of artistic (rather than functional) close-ups to highlight faces in cinematography until Scenes of true life, produced by Vitagraph between 1908 and 1910[584].

On later seasons, sports competitions also became popular on cinema, and Graner's programs also paid special attention to documentary recordings of contemporary events, like the war with Morocco or different events to which the royal family assisted. As well, once stage performances were forbidden at the Mercè hall by the local government new security norms, Graner revitalized the appeal of the cinematographic program by introducing long colored films. One of the most remarkable pieces from the repertoire was the collection of films produced in 1908 by Films d'art featuring actors from the Comédie française.

These recordings presented renowned classical piece from French theater, played by the most prominent actors, and tried to consolidate cinema as a legitimate art by linking it to settled arts like dramatic literature, even if the visual language went back to a fixed camera on a theatrical set[585]. Some of these films even included music specifically composed for them, like El retorn d'Ulises [The return of Ulysses], with music by Georges Hüe. Imitating this trend, the artistic team from the Mercè hall also wrote music for some other screenings, like the film Els balls populars a través del món [Folk dances across the world], for which Joan B. Lambert wrote new music.

Consequently, the Mercè hall quickly emerged as a prominent film venue in Catalonia, renowned for the artistic quality of its productions, its exclusive right of screening and distribution of famous foreign titles, and its adherence to a moral standard. The model established by the example of the Mercè hall was characterized not only by its cinematographic offer, but also by the meticulous design of the space, including its artistic decoration and spaces dedicated to installation art.

This model of hall was to be replicated, emulated, or copied in other municipalities, becoming the reference for other artists that wanted to open their own recreational venues under the same ideological standards. New halls either compared themselves to the Mercè hall as a marketing strategy, or the press compared them to the Mercè hall, used as a standard reference to assess the novel recreational venues. It's worth noting the Sala Valls in the municipality of Valls and the Sala Mercè in Arenys de Mar as official distributors of the films of Graner's Sala Mercè, promoting not only a network of musical visions, but also a cinematographic one.

Nevertheless, after renting the Principal theater and installing there his Espectacles-Audicions Graner, the impresario eventually focused on theatrical productions, which allowed him further exploration with the use of color and simultaneous music. The technology of cinema was still not ready for the "total work of art" that Modernists were looking for. However, the expenses needed to produce a movie only had to be paid once and could be amortized with additional screenings, while in a theatrical production, actors and the orchestra had to be paid for every performance. When Graner abandoned the model of cinematographic screenings and a musical vision that wrapped up each session in favor of entirely performed sessions at the Principal theater, his business model would collapse.

❖ The underground grottos

Besides the main floor that hosted the stage and projection booth for the film screenings and performance of musical visions, the Mercè hall also had an underground level used for art installations. There, Graner was able to continue working on plastic creation and the artistic design of different entertainment attractions that people could visit for a very cheap price, which caused long lines of visitors across the Rambla waiting to enter. The first one that opened this space to the public was the Nativity scene of 1904, which became one of the trademarks of the Mercè hall on every Christmas season:

> "Today, the Mercè hall will host the opening of an attractive fantasy show featuring underground caves with stalactites and stalagmites, replicating the most picturesque ones in Artà and Manacor. Various dioramas and plastic tableaux will also be on display, representing the birth of the Messiah, the Annunciation, the flight into Egypt, the cave of Friar Garí, and a natural waterfall, all artistically presented with lighting and color effects[586]".

As other reviews also point out, the human figures were real-sized, which, with the right combination of lights and shadows, created a great impact on the public that visited the underground grottos. Visual illusions created with dioramas and lighting techniques became quite popular, making this "moral" and "innocent" attraction appealing for every family and child. The press stated that, on Christmas Day and Saint Steve's Day (25th and 26th of December, both holidays in Catalonia), around 4,000 people had visited the Nativity scene installed at the Mercè hall[587].

Figure 158: Postcard with the title: "Sala Mercè. Monumental pessebre". Only known image of the Nativity scenes installed at the Mercè hall. It probably corresponds to the scene "Masia catalana" or "Catalan country house" installed in 1907. [Unknown date, personal archive].

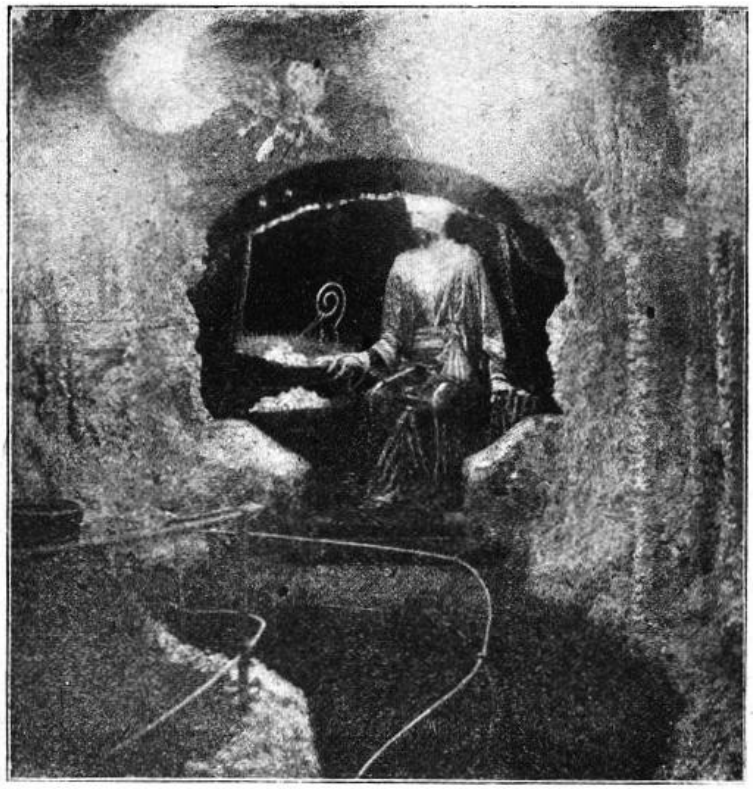
As well, the design made by Gaudí for the entire floor was found very appealing for the public. It recreated the inside of a cave, with stalactites and stalagmites. It was designed in the shape of a grotto, with a pathway to follow and a handrail separating the visitors from the installations, as visible in some of the following pictures. The walls imitating rocks were built in iron and concrete, which made it incombustible, safe in case of the so common fires that took place in cinematographic halls.



Since most of the attention and dedication of the artistic team during the 1905/06 season was focused on the opening of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater, little was said about the artistic installations at the Mercè hall, besides the reprise of the Nativity scene for Christmas. In 1906, the grottos were renovated under Graner's direction, painted in metallic tones and decorated with green plants. It was announced that, besides Graner, also artists Ricardo Urgell, Eusebio Tolosa, Domingo Soler and Antoni Ros i Güell worked on the plastic construction of Graner's design. As the press described its different scenes:

> "[…] These scenes depict episodes from the birth of Jesus, such as the journey of the Three Kings, the angel's announcement to the shepherds, the flight to Egypt, the manger in Bethlehem, and the Adoration. In all of them, it is impossible to distinguish the dividing line between the distant horizon painted on the canvas and the field of vision in the foreground. The plasticity of the reliefs continues imperceptibly and perfectly through the painting with the most distant landscapes, in the most insignificant detail, in the accidental placement of a figure, the skilled hand of the artist who conceived the whole painting and executes it perfectly as he had preconceived appears.
> In The Adoration, visitors are struck by the unique firmament studded with constellations of twinkling stars of varying magnitudes scattered asymmetrically against the backdrop of an intensely turquoise blue sky illuminated by an inexplicable clarity that allows objects to be perfectly distinguished without losing the distinctive character of the night sky, offering a pleasant contrast to the semi-iridescent turns of bright light projected onto the portal in ruins. It is a must-see, as it is impossible to describe accurately.
> The facilities are on the ground floor, converted into a large grotto of stalactites and stalagmites in columns that reminds me of Fingal's cave, irregularly subdivided into others to give it greater variety. The columns, artfully dotted with metallic touches, are covered with a fine veil of twilight dew that gives them the appearance of the humidity typical of caves. […][588]".

The underground grottos gained special protagonism on the 1907/08 season, when the stage performances at the Mercè hall were prohibited by the new local laws destined to avoid stage fires at cinematographic venues. The season opened in mid-September with a new installation with the Giant of the Pine, a characteristic figure from Catalan folklore, as the central figure:

> "The grottoes have already been inaugurated in the Mercè hall, which constitute a unique and new spectacle in Barcelona. The mechanical theater with its great variety of transformations, the dwarfs dance, the Giant of the Pine, with its imposing appearance and magnificently dressed, treats all visitors to toys and jewels, and other attractions and surprises were a great success at the opening. It is to be believed that all of Barcelona will parade through these marvelous caves[589]".

"The Giant of the Pine, who lives at the grottos of the Mercè hall and treats its visitors with surprises. Good giant!"

In December, 1907, the typical Nativity scene came back to the grottos. This time, it was made of three scenes: the flight to Egypt, the Annunciation and the Catalan country house. Graner enjoyed again the collaboration of Ricardo Urgell and Antoni Ros i Güell for the plastic construction of the scenes. It was followed on the spring by the installation of El palau de la sirena or The Mermaid's Palace, which opened in late March, 1908:

> "Graner is about to inaugurate a new show in the caves. Now he's decided to build a mermaid's palace and for days he has had a crew of workers and artisans at work, who will turn a stretch of underground into a marvelous underwater dwelling. And there will be light, and there will be glass of every color and shape. There will be some twelve tons of crystal alone in the mermaid's palace. And amid that burst of brightness and sparkle, a host of gigantic spy-devils and other little creatures, all transparent, will move about, forming the mermaid's court[590]".

As multiple reviews state, the installation included a large quantity of crystals and created fantastic light effects combining different colors and reflections throughout the grottos, an "extraordinary delight for the eyes". A statue was also placed representing the mermaid hostess of the palace; however, it was made of wood and critics pointed out that they should have placed a real person instead. The comment will be heard by Graner and considered for the following installation.

In April, coinciding with the Easter festivities, new elements were installed to refresh the mermaid's palace installation, and it was only replaced by the end of the year to install again the traditional Nativity scene for Christmas. The critic Lluís Benaiges explained, while commenting the Nativity installation, the motivation behind it and the social function it was destined to:

> "Our grandparents and our parents didn't need any other spectacles to have fun than those celebrated in the warmth of family. […] But modern winds are banishing, especially in the big cities, the simple customs that tightened the bonds of family life more and more. And no longer finding this within the home to satisfy his yearning, we seek it in amusements and distractions and all manner of frivolities that we have come to call attractions, which here and there in the city surround us like a dizzying spectacle.
> Convinced of this, Graner —convinced that the family Nativity scene is now almost nowhere to be found in the home— has wanted to place it where the modern trends carry the crowds. At the Mercè hall, there the brilliant artist has brought it, flaunting it; and the simple family Nativity scene has become, in the caves of Graner's spectacles, a superb and splendid work.
> The Annunciation, the shepherds, the Nativity, all the pastoral scenes —the delight of our childhood— have become, at the Mercè hall, a delight for adults, an aesthetic pleasure that speaks to the heart and the mind[591]".

After the holidays, the last of Graner's original installations will be seen at the Mercè hall. In April 10th, 1909, El palau d'en Banyeta or Banyeta the Demon's Palace will be opened at the underground caves as a "Dantesque vision of hell". The different scenes of the installation will recreate the spaces and elements associated with the figure of Banyeta and Pere Botero, characters from Catalan folklore that inhabit hell and boil people on their cauldrons. As well, a musical vision about them had been produced by Graner at the Principal theater under the title Les calderes de Pere Botero. As for the current underground installation:

> "This is the plastic representation of the palace of Banyeta, with all its dependencies and boiler departments and with all the magnificence of the devil's royal house.
> He, seated on his throne atop a crater whose immense fiery mouth gapes at his feet, surrounded by red-hot rivets of blazing chains hanging from the ceiling and walls, will receive the public in the palace's antechamber, delivering speeches appropriate to the circumstances.
> Venturing into the red interiors, the children of Barcelona will see the immensely open mouth of a chimerical dragon who, scooping up red embers with its forked tongue, will grant them passage into its depths, where they can see the stirring of the great cauldrons of Pere Botero and the leaping and shrieking of little devils[592]".

This time, Banyeta the Demon was played by a real person, in the company of kids that played his court of little demons, as can be seen next to him in the following picture. However, in the late 1900's, anti-Catalanism had become a noticeable movement in Catalonia after the great electoral success of nationalist coalition Solidaritat Catalana. As a way of sabotaging the Mercè hall, anti-Catalanist journals started to criticize Graner's installation since he was supposedly "scaring children" with visions of hell and "exploiting them" while benefiting from their work as actors. In late June, 1909, only a couple of months after the installation was opened, the governor of Barcelona prohibited that any children would take part as an actor at the Mercè hall's installations.

Nevertheless, the installation continued as a great success and remained at the underground grottos until the end of the year, when the Nativity scenes came back for Christmas. This probably was the last installation directed and designed by Graner. After spending some time working in America, the painter eventually emigrated from Barcelona in 1910 to remain there permanently after his lease contract at the Principal theater had come to an end. In November 1910, the Mercè hall was announced at the press looking for a new owner.

❖ Stage productions

Besides the previously mentioned attractions offered at the Mercè hall, the main production in the program was the repertoire of musical visions. These short musical plays were performed on the small stage of the venue at the end of every session, preceded by cinematographic screenings. The troupe of actors and actresses mainly included children, like Mercè Viola or Pilar Corbinos. There were as well adult actors and actresses that mostly came from the amateur field. Some of them achieved a professional level and were moved to the Principal theater company, such as the cases of Ramon Tor (1880–1951), Lluís Puiggarí and Artur Balot, as well as the aforementioned Mercè Viola. The same situation took place with the creative team, which initially included names such as Josep Carner, Joan B. Lambert and Adrià Gual, who later moved to the project at the Principal theater. The Mercè hall, therefore, held the role of a training hub, where actors and creators could rehearse before moving to the larger stage. There were, however, remarkable names that achieved notable success at the Mercè hall but remained on the small-scale stages, like actor and stage director Baldomer Marinel·lo or painter and set designer Antoni Ros i Güell.

Throughout the three and a half seasons that the scenic project lasted at the Mercè hall, the style and content of the repertoire of musical visions shifted and evolved, although it maintained the same form and imagery based on short plays that depicted medievalistic and fantastic settings, aimed at materially visualizing oral folklore and tales from the Catalan tradition. The initial goal of these stage productions was the plastic and visual experimentation under the artistic direction of Lluís Graner. The projection of shadows creating silhouettes, the use of electric lights mixing their colors and changing intensities, even combinations of filmed scenes with live performance on stage, were all new and extremely modern elements to experiment with on stage. The following season focused on the poetic suggestion and nationalist Symbolism materializing on stage folk songs and legends from Catalan folklore, while following productions were rather based on moral teaching through children's popular tales and eventually some comic pieces, still including incidental or casual singing of folk songs and the characteristic medievalistic imagery.

The following section will comment on the line of programming that the venue followed before the live stage performances were interrupted by the restrictive municipal regulations that forced its halting.

- 1904/05 season

On November 3rd, 1904, the Mercè hall was inaugurated, owned by painter Lluís Graner and designed by architect Antoni Gaudí. The venue offered cinematograph sessions culminating in a staged "musical vision", a term appearing here for the first time. The new genre was built upon Adrià Gual's theoretic foundations, already essayed in 1899 with the "Catalan folk song arranged for the stage" titled Blancaflor. The playwright was even hired as stage director for the first two seasons programmed at the Mercè hall.

The earliest experiments with musical visions focused primarily on the lighting and plastic aspects. Lluís Graner was directly involved in the artistic and visual conception of the shows with the aim of overcoming the technical limits of traditional painting. His goal as a senior painter was to explore with live lighting and to experiment with the changes of colors and intensities projected by spotlights on painted backdrops, while also adding a sonic dimension with simultaneous music and poetic lyrics. Musical visions, for Graner, were a step forward towards the achievement of a total work of art that diluted the traditional limits of artistic disciplines and merged them into one single piece.

Consequently, Graner worked on projecting shadows and silhouettes on stage, as in the vision of Montserrat, in which he recreated the iconic outline of Montserrat mountain while children sang chants in honor of the Virgin the hermitage in Montserrat is dedicated to, with a final fantastic appearance of a little girl playing Virgin Mary between beams of white light. As well, they worked combining colors between the painted backdrops and the colored spotlights projected on them, as was the case with Dante a les portes de l'infern [Dante at the gates of hell]), a scene presenting poet Dante at the gates depicted by himself in his Inferno accompanied by Boito's Mefistofele instrumental opening, from which Adrià Gual's watercolors for the stage design are still preserved. Some of the presented works also recreated natural effects on stage, such as the storm that takes place in the vision of L'Atlàntida [Atlantis], inspired on the prologue of Jacint Verdaguer's homonymous poem. This line of work will continue the following season, for example, with La matinada [The sunrise] at the Principal theater, also conceived by Lluís Graner.

Another remarkable piece from this season was Sant Jordi matà l'aranya [Saint George killed the spider], which seems to be an adaptation of Artur Guash Tombas comic piece from 1892 based on mythological character of Saint George, patron saint of Catalonia. The notable aspect, though, is the combination of live performance on stage with screened filming. The piece starts with a dialogue on stage between two characters that seem to be a grandfather with his grandson, in which the first explains to the latter the legend of Saint George. A window to the idealized world of mythology is opened and, when the curtain closes, the filmed images of Saint George fighting the dragon and projected on the curtain accompanied by light music. A similar technique was used to frame the ideal world of Blancaflor between scenes of the real world, as will happen again in future pieces produced at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, such as La Fustots [Cinderella].

As well, the plastic tableau La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta… already introduced a paradigmatical example of how the main dramaturgical conception of the genre would be for the following seasons: the direct staging of a folk song, presenting on stage the exact actions and events narrated on the original lyrics of the folk song, while the melody is orchestrated and glossed to make it long enough to last for most of the scene. In this case, the song speaks of young Mary, mother of Christ, going to school as a little girl to learn how to sew and write in company of Saint Paula and Saint Susanna.

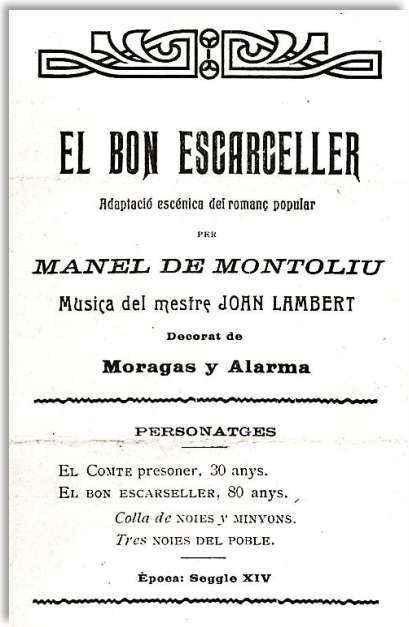
One aspect emphasized from the outset by the musical visions produced by Lluís Graner is the religious belief. During Lent, in accordance with the Catholic tradition of not staging theatrical performances, the musical visions will be replaced by cinematic-format visions based on biblical episodes, such as L'oració a l'hort [The prayer in the garden] and El calvari [The calvary]. Reviews on the day the hall opened were already joking about the number of clergies who attended the event, given the moralizing character Graner had announced for his shows from the very beginning.

Another main attraction from the Mercè hall was the "spoken films". During its first season, the hall produced its own short comic films and, during screenings, the actors spoke their lines aloud while hidden behind the curtain or on the orchestral pit. Graner obtained a patent for these shows as the city's first sound screenings through this particular technique. As well, on the spring of 1905, the Mercè hall produced a series of films in which they recorded well-known figures from Catalan cultural life and showed them to the public in their usual creative activities. Painters such as Modest Urgell, Ramon Casas, Santiago Rusiñol, and Lluís Graner himself were especially featured creating portraits or drawings. Several films were also recorded of rehearsals of the Orfeó Català with Lluís Millet, given the good relation between Graner and the choir's director.



In addition to its regular sessions, the hall was also used for concerts by external associations, such as on November 16th and 18th and December 13th, 1904, when the Mercè hall hosted the concert season of the Philharmonic Society. Also, other associations offered evening performances by renting the hall, as was the case with Foment Autonomista Català, which offered a subscription for the night sessions of four consecutive Wednesdays beginning May 17th, 1905, to schedule its evening gatherings.

The Mercè hall also had a basement level inspired by the Drach caves in Mallorca that was used to house artistic installations. During this first season, the scenes from the monumental nativity scene, inaugurated on December 22nd, 1904, stood out. There were life-sized statues by Enric Clarasó, waterfalls, dioramas, and a multitude of color effects produced with electric lighting.

- 1905/06 season

In 1905, the Mercè hall offered a new season of musical visions and film screenings, continuing the style of the previous one. The season opened on September 13th with the premiere of La mort de l'escolà [The death of the altar boy], a musical vision based on Antoni Nicolau's well-known song set to Verdaguer's poem. The hall's next production, La dona d'aigua [Aloja or Undine], also consisted of the staging of a preexisting poem, in this case by Miquel Costa i Llobera (1854–1922), about a character from Catalan mythology.

Other visions were directly based on the original retrieved folk legends and songs, as is the case with A la voreta del mar [By the sea], a popular song arranged here by Adrià Esquerrà, or La pastoreta [The little shepherd], with music arranged by Narcisa Freixas. Also noteworthy is the case of La cova de les serps [The serpent's cave], a musical vision based on a Germanic legend, which underscores the internationalist conception of the use of folk legend that Adrià Gual, the stage director, explains in his theoretical writings.

Nevertheless, more dramatized visions were also introduced, with greater literary development. El bon escarceller [The good jailer], with text by Manuel de Montoliu, presents a dramatic scene in which the jailed count explains the story of how he arrived there in a sung intervention following the metric form of a medieval ballad. La fada de la font [The fairy of the fountain] expands the number of scenes that musical visions typically had, to the point that the press referred to it as a "short little drama". Enric Morera's Christmas scenes, titled El mal rabadà [The bad goatherd], include the glossing of three different traditional Christmas songs, rather than one song per work as was usually the case.

Although the Mercè hall remained very active this season and expanded its network of literary and musical collaborators, the opening of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater captured most of the press' attention. Due to the success of the Mercè hall's first season, its owner and director, Lluís Graner, decided to rent the Principal theater to stage there as well his repertoire of comic and moral films, as well as more ambitious musical productions with full orchestra.

However, the Principal theater will begin a rivalry with other major theaters, such as the Romea theater, and the Mercè hall will continue competing with the city's other small performance venues, making the morality and suitability of its program for children and families its hallmark. Although spoken films continued to be announced, with few titles specified on the press, documentaries of current events will become more common in the cinematographic repertoire. In the summer of 1906, the Mercè hall remained open with special film screenings and will stage reprises of musical visions from the previous season, such as Sant Jordi matà l'aranya and Dante a les portes de l'infern.

This new season at the Mercè hall presents a major shift in its theatrical production. The departure of Adrià Gual from the scenic direction of both the Mercè hall and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner led to a succession that altered both the number of new productions per season and their dramaturgical nature.

The theater's new direction team expanded the number of productions: whereas last season there were 9 new plays and 2 reprises, this season features 23 new plays and 2 reprises. This change will affect how long a play runs; whereas last season a play ran for between 3 and 6 weeks, now plays will run for about 2 weeks. Unlike the scheduling at the Principal theater, where the company performed different plays in each session of the day to diversify the offering, at the Mercè hall there is only one production scheduled at a time for all sessions.

There will also be a notable shift in the dramaturgical principles of the new productions. Under Adrià Gual's direction, musical visions glossed traditional songs or legends collected by folklorists, but now the new season will produce works much closer to popular children's tales. This use of popular tales, although it contrasts with the lyricism and mythological character of earlier musical visions, still fits within the theoretical precepts of the musical vision genre and does not represent a major conceptual shift. We could consider this the second stage in the evolution of the musical visions genre, in which the most suggestive medievalist Symbolism of the early days gives way to a more narrative theater with a moralizing message aimed at children.

For instance, the season opened with the production of La nevada [The snowfall], written by Manuel Marinel·lo with music by Adrià Esquerrà and stage design by Antoni Ros i Güell. The play is made of two scenes, following the style of a traditional children's tale. On the first one, a couple of orphan children gently host at home two travelers that arrive on a cold winter night while singing folk songs on their way. On the second one, these travelers turn out to be rich people that reward the children taking them on a fancy carriage with them, teaching the children in the audience the moral lesson that unexpected good will be granted to you if you're kind and generous to people.

Nevertheless, there will still be some new titles based on the direct staging of Catalan folk songs, such as El mal ric [The bad rich man] or La gentil porquerola [The kind little swineherd]. The titles based on foreign fairy tales stand out especially, such as La caperutxa roja [Little red riding hood] (by Charles Perrault and retold by the Brothers Grimm) or Somni d'una nit d'hivern [A winter night's dream] (an adaptation of Hans Christian Andersen's The little match girl). The line of productions based on biblical episodes or religious figures is also continued, with titles such as Somni de Jacob [Jacob's dream], Jesús és nat [Jesus is born], or Moisès [Moses].

In addition to the lyric theater performances, the screening of films of various types (documentaries, newsreels, comedic fiction…) continued as usual, and visual attractions continued to be installed in the basement grottos. During this season, the large nativity scene installed for the Christmas holidays was announced as a special highlight. It should also be noted that during the summer, at the end of the season, problems will begin with the Barcelona City Council regarding new requirements for performance venues, which will force renovations on the hall to bring it into compliance with the new regulations.

The venue remained open during the summer, but the pieces staged during these months confirm a shift in the production of musical visions, presenting a rather comic tone. Joan B. Lambert was especially dedicated to the summer's production, writing music for the visions El foc de Sant Joan [Saint John's fire], performed on the occasion of the midsummer night, picturing the Catalan traditional celebrations on Saint John's eve, or En Boritlles i en Tinyós [Cigarette Butts and Mangy], a comic short play depicting the arrival of a soldier to a cave protected by a female guardian, following the folk motif from the song Els tres tambors [The three drummers].

❖ Suspension of theatrical performances

The 1907/08 season began on September 12th with the opening of a new renovation of the subterranean grottoes. The new facility featured a "gegant del Pi" automaton and dancing dwarves. The start of theatrical activity took place on the 21st with the premiere of Rialles i ploralles [Laughters and tears]. The titles premiered at the start of the season suggest that the programming continued the trend of the previous season: comic musical visions (such as Rialles i ploralles), moral tales (such as Ensenyança domèstica [House schooling]), alternated with some traditional glosses of popular songs (L'hostal de la Peira [The hostel in Peira]). It is worth noting that the music for all three was written by Joan B. Lambert, a collaborator who was personally very close to the artistic director.

Despite the company's willingness to continue its operations, new municipal measures aimed at movie theaters began to be announced in September. Previously, the city council had already required architectural reforms and remodeling of performance halls to ensure emergency exits and prevent overcrowding due to regular fires in these venues. In this case, a ban on stage performances in movie theaters was being requested. It included "all those that require decorations, scenery, [and] lighting effects[593]", that is, the main elements of musical performances. Additionally, musicians' pits were prohibited in movie theaters.

In November, stage performances were officially banned in several movie halls, including the Mercè hall. The last production announced before the ban, Se n'ha de venir de mena [You must have been born that way], never made it to premiere. Nevertheless, the hall remained open. The main floor continued its film programming and increased advertising in newspapers and announcements of newly released titles, many of which were exclusive or commissioned for the theater. Highlights included current events films, documentaries, sports films, and comedic fiction. However, the main attraction was the basement grottoes, where Lluís Graner was able to continue designing artistic installations.

After installing the traditional Great Nativity scene he set up every Christmas, Graner announced a new major project in the caves: "The Mermaid's Palace". According to the press, twelve tons of glass and crystal were installed in the caves. With multiple spotlights and bulbs of different colors and intensities, an optical play of lights and reflections was created. A wooden statue represented the mermaid, and a series of small beasts and imps formed her court.

On the other hand, the actors performing at the Mercè hall did have to leave the venue. For the rest of the season, they toured other Catalan cities and towns, bringing the Mercè hall's musical visions —which served as a publicity draw— to those places.

The Mercè hall's activities under Lluís Graner's direction lasted until 1910, when the painter announced its closure.

❖ Company tours

After theatrical performances were banned at the Mercè hall in November 1907, its actors moved to other stages outside of Barcelona, where theatrical performances in cinema halls were still permitted. For the remainder of the season, they toured various Catalan towns, presenting "the musical visions of the Sala Mercè", which had become well known thanks to their success and the opening of other musical vision halls throughout Catalonia.

It seems the first tour was staged in Terrassa, although it's billed as the reopening of Ars-Lucis. This venue, located in Terrassa, was part of Graner's network and had already begun presenting musical visions in the city during the previous season, under the direction of Joaquim Vancells. In mid-November, the venue announced the start of new activity, which materialized in a brief winter season. Three musical visions were staged to celebrate Christmas and Three Kings' Day. The venue's programming continued with film-only screenings until the end of February.

From late January to early February 1908, the actors from the Mercè hall performed at the Euterpe theater's new cinema hall, the Sala Novetats. They staged Mentides que no fan mal [Lies that do not hurt] and El senyor mestre està malalt [The teacher is sick], which had been premiered in Barcelona during spring and summer of the previous year.

On February 8th, the company arrived at the theater of the Centre de Lectura in Reus, where it stayed until the end of March. There, they performed a wide variety of musical visions from the Mercè hall, accompanied by film projections also from Barcelona. The Centre de Lectura's institutional support would have facilitated this stay, which was announced in the program booklets as "Audicions Graner", even though the works came from the repertoire premiered the previous season in the Mercè hall. To conclude the tour, the company premiered a new original musical vision titled Somni de gloria [Dream of glory], with lyrics by Josep Ferré i Gendre and music by Salvador Grau Martí. At the same time, the Patronat de l'Obrer of Tarragona was interested in staging some of the Mercè hall's productions with its own theater troupe. They even wrote their own version of La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida].

The last tour that can be confirmed took place at the Agricultural Center of Vilafranca del Penedès. On May 31st, the Mercè hall's musical visions were inaugurated, featuring Pilar Corbinos in a leading role. At least Sant Ramon [Saint Raymond] and Mentides que no fan mal were performed during the stay, which lasted until at least June 7th. It's not confirmed whether the same cast of actors and actresses remained throughout the entire season and its various tours. It seems that at least the names of Baldomer Marinel·lo and the girl Pilar Corbinos did. According to press reviews, this tour was not very successful, and it seems that it was the company's last tour of the season.

Nevertheless, the interest in musical visions did not end there. Baldomer Marinel·lo scheduled another season of musical visions at the Imperi hall from September 1911 to January 1912. Josefa Ferrer, who had worked with him during the tour in Reus, was part of his cast.

❖ Final period and transfer

After the suspension of theatrical performances, the Mercè hall's next major events were the traditional Christmas nativity scene of 1908 and the notable installation of the "Palau d'en Banyeta", which occupied the grottoes from April until December before being replaced by a new nativity scene. However, in February 1909, Banyeta's palace was reinstalled with new features to renew its appeal.

Banyeta's palace displayed cauldrons of hell, craters and sparks of fire, and even featured the great Banyeta demon seated on his throne. Unlike in the previous installation, where the mermaid had been a wooden figure, Banyeta was portrayed by a real person. Several children also participated as little devils. However, throughout 1909, there was growing opposition to child labor and the supposed immorality of frightening children with scenes of hell. In June, children were finally prohibited from participating in the grotto installations.

Conversely, the appeal of the film programming was renewed by including live music performed exclusively for the films being screened, as well as the premiere of exclusive productions, particularly sporting events and the recordings of theatrical performances by the most famous French theater actors. The special children's shows organized in direct collaboration with the schools were also notable.

It should also be noted that when the Mercè hall's stage activities were halted by a municipal ban, Lluís Graner requested ownership of the hall's trade name "Sala Mercè". In the following years, other companies and venues used the Mercè hall's name as a commercial draw to attract customers to their own enterprises[594].

In early 1910, rumors began to circulate about Graner's departure and the sale of the venue. Graner had, in fact, returned to the professional activity of painting in November 1909. In February 1910, he travelled to America for a painting tour. He mainly stayed in New York, where he held exhibitions of his artwork. Due to his success and the warm reception he received, he remained there until May, painting portraits of various American personalities.

Since he returned to Barcelona, monthly raffles of toys and photographic portraits among the children in attendance began to be announced at the Mercè hall. This would be the only novelty in the hall, since no new projects were announced at the grottoes.

With the arrival of summer 1910, the five-year lease on the Principal theater, which had begun in 1905, was coming to an end. Although he had delegated the company's management to Antoni Niubó and Enrique Vinyals, he was the contract holder and was responsible for settling the debts with the Hospital de la Santa Creu, the theater's owner. Once he was finally disentangled from the Principal theater, the rumors that had been circulating for some time were confirmed when Graner announced the sale of the business in November 1910.

The activity that takes place after Lluís Graner's departure is not fully clear due to the lack of research and documentation on this purely cinematic period, as well as the contradictions in the existing bibliography. Studies on Ros i Güell, who took on the lead of the artistic installations at the grottoes, are also scarce, and much of the activity in the grottoes remains unknown.

The Mercè hall continued its operations under the newly established film company Hispano Films, which began its business activities in July 1911 and leased the venue starting in September:

> "A corporation called «Hispano Films» has been established in the county city, which will be dedicated to the editing of films in Barcelona.
> In addition, this company has leased the Mercè hall to operate the cinematograph and grotesques, whose premises are undergoing restoration and beautification work[595]."

The new company upholds the principle of morality in its productions as one of its core values, like Graner did. It also brings Adrià Gual's work back to the Mercè hall, this time as a film director[596].

During this period, Hispano Films expanded its operations internationally. In 1913, it was reconstituted as a joint-stock company, though this time the word "morality" was removed from the clauses of its new statutes.

It seems that the Hispano Films company will continue holding film screenings at the Mercè hall until May 1915. The venue will reopen on November 18th of that year to host the "Espectacles Patufet" associated with the magazine En Patufet. However, a few months later, the new shows had to close due to misunderstandings between Hispano Films, which owned the venue, and the building's owners:

> "Espectacles Patufet
> Dear Patufet followers, you're all surely already aware. Our shows have been suspended. When they were most splendid, when they were fulfilling the purpose for which they were created, an unpleasant unforeseen event, the legal action between the owner of the house where the Mercè hall is located and the company Hispano Films, which owns the lot —and in which the spectacles company has no involvement— has led to their suspension, until a future occasion is arranged[597]."

With its film screenings suspended by court order, the venue remained closed until 1936. At that time, it reopened under the name "Cinema Atlàntic", and the entire interior was renovated, erasing all traces of Gaudí's design for Graner's original Mercè hall.

A few years before that, in 1933, Antoni Ros i Güell had reopened the grotto shows to the basement of the Olympia theater, reviving the commercial name "Grottoes of the Mercè hall". Ros i Güell, a regular collaborator with the Sala Mercè as a set designer for the musical visions and the subterranean artistic installations, inaugurated the new "grottoes" with a revival of Banyeta's palace. Soon after, he also recovered the traditional great nativity scenes like the ones Graner used to install[598].

This same year, Pahissa's opera Gal·la Placídia was being reprised at the Liceu opera house and the actor Josep Santpere was directing his own company of vaudeville at the Teatre Espanyol, proving that the generation of artist trained at Graner's enterprises made a long career afterwards.

Espectacles-Audicions Graner[599]

After a first successful season was arranged at the Mercè hall by debuting Lluís Graner, newly reconverted to theater impresario, the former painter decided to embark on a greater theatrical journey. The stage experimentation he had developed at the small-scale stage of the Mercè hall, which was actually registered as a cinematographic hall, required now a larger stage. The long lines that formed at the entrance of the Mercè hall led Graner to consider that he needed to take his lyric productions to a larger scale. The nearby Principal theater, located at the same avenue where the Mercè hall was, had been the main theater of the city of Barcelona, which still held a symbolic place in the capital's cultural imagery, but was at the present moment in a decadent state, in regards of its architectonic structure and the quality of the productions that were programmed.

When the bet for the lease of the theater was announced, Graner had no doubt about his intentions, eventually achieving his purpose. He installed there his "Espectacles-Audicions Graner" and transferred the best staff under his service: Adrià Gual as stage director, Josep Carner as literary arranger and Joan B. Lambert as musical conductor, who were already working at his Mercè hall. Graner built a network around the theater that gathered most of the personalities of Catalan culture, in an effort of institutionalizing, centralizing and unifying Catalan culture under the same roof. However, the large-scale production expenses of a venue like this exceeded Graner's management skills, who was not able to produce benefits to maintain the project in the long term.

This section delineates the company's economic planning, encompassing a review of the theater's leasing conditions, the refurbishment and modernization of the building, employee expenses, incoming revenue, and debt. Moreover, the economic analysis reviews the policies of low-priced tickets, high production costs, specific investments for maintenance, events and season tickets to attract audiences, as well as the effects this has on the programming of the various seasons.

All of the aforementioned matters are based on an extensive compilation and cataloguing of newspaper articles, letters, and archival documents preserved in relation to the company, which are scattered among different and disparate collections due to the exile of director and sponsor Lluís Graner to America after his lease concluded, and the fire of 1915 that destroyed the theater's archives.

However, it is noteworthy to remark the administrative documents and correspondence between Lluís Graner and the Hospital Board on which most of the following economical and administrative statements are based. These documents can be found in the Historical Archive of the Hospital de la Santa Creu i Sant Pau under the reference code CAT AHSCP 01-I.6-02-04.01-7.110.

❖ Leasing of the Principal theater

The Principal Theater in Barcelona, located on the city's Rambla that traverses from Plaza Catalunya to Drassanes, was under the ownership of the Hospital de la Santa Cruz during this period. The theater's management was put out to tender for five-year contracts, and the most ethical proposal offering the highest percentage of profits to the hospital would be awarded the contract[600]. However, this one was not an easy theater to manage.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the Catalan bourgeoisie and the higher-income population had already migrated to the new neighborhoods of the Eixample, which featured larger apartments and more amenities. Consequently, the narrow alleys of the old town were left to be inhabited by the working and lower classes, an audience that was known to frequent the revue and comedy theaters along the Paral·lel avenue. In contrast, the residents of the Eixample went to the Romea and the Liceu theaters, leaving the Principal theater fall between two stools as they regarded it "too downhill" on the Rambla for them to reach.

Amid rumors and speculation that the theater would end up being used for "depraved" genres or converted into a bank headquarters, Lluís Graner made the decision to allocate funds for the comprehensive renovation and refurbishment of the building, with the objective of restoring it to its original state as a cultural center for Barcelona. He aspired for the Principal theater to work as a nexus for the Catalan intelligentsia, offering both the working and the wealthy classes access to high-quality shows that would be used to glorify Catalan culture.

Following the expiration of Caferino Palencia's lease at the end of the 1904/05 season, Pasqual Andreu assumed operation of the theater under a summer contract, offering film screenings and other variety shows until September 30th. It seems that the impresario expected to remain as the manager of the theater for the entire following season, unaware that his summer contract was temporary and would only be in effect until the five-year tender was convened and signed.

On July 24th, he submitted a formal letter of grievance to the Hospital Board, expressing his discontent regarding the tender, of which he had just become aware, and which was scheduled to take place on August 2nd. He explained that if his contract was not renewed, he would be unable to recoup all the investment made to adapt the theater to his shows. It seems that he prepared a preliminary proposal and rental offer for the tender, but so hastily that he did not complete it with his signature or date, thereby failing to render it official.

Those who had submitted bids for the five-year tender to manage the theater between October 1905 and May 1910 were Antoni Estrada, Manuel Salvat, and Lluís Graner. The terms of the lease tender stipulated the following requirements:

- Performances must be appropriate in terms of morality, modesty, and decorum.
- Masquerade balls of any kind are prohibited.
- At least 130 public evening performances per season.
- Seasons must be divided into three periods: October to December, January to March, and April to the end of the season on May 31st. A minimum of 50 performances was required in the first and second periods, and a minimum of 30 in the third.
- The theater could not hold performances during Holy Week, from Palm Sunday to Holy Saturday, and should remain closed on those days.
- All employee salaries, electricity bills, and theater operating expenses are to be paid by the impresario. The auditor, janitor, and doorman receive 5, 4, and 3 pesetas, respectively. The auditor was paid on each day of performance, while the janitor and doorman were paid fortnightly in advance. Machinery operators received 27,5 pesetas per performance. Cleaning staff received 7,5 pesetas per day, plus a bonus of 0,75 on days with extra performances.
- The impresario is responsible for the maintenance and reparation of the theater's equipment and machinery.
- The Hospital Board and the city council would keep two boxes and three seats reserved on the main floor.
- The Hospital Board would keep the use of the painting workshop, the dance foyer, the entrance hall, and the ticket offices where tickets are sold.
- The bar must be open throughout the performances so that members of the Ateneu Barcelonès can go through from the theater to their cultural center without going outdoors.

We know that Estrada's bid, submitted on June 16th, proposed installing a cinema and variety shows at the Principal theater. As for Salvat, he offered to surpass the stipulated requirements by conducting 150 performances per season and allocating 10% of the proceeds to the hospital, thereby ensuring a minimum of 18.000 pesetas.

Given this rivalry, on July 31st, just two days before the tender deadline, Graner wrote to express his interest and revised his offer to 15% and a minimum of 20,000 pesetas, while also increasing the deposit amount from 3,000 to 5,000 pesetas. On August 2nd, the competitors remitted a deposit of 1,500 pesetas to take part in the competition, which was won by Lluís Graner.

❖ Inaugural refurbishment

Graner's lease commenced on October 1st, 1905, and during the initial month, he submitted numerous requests to the Hospital Board while establishing and organizing his business. He requested the use of the dance foyer and painting workshop spaces to install a tailor's workshop and conduct other operations. The Board agreed, although subsequent grievances arose because Graner exceeded his rights and occupied too much common space storing the stage sets, clothing, furniture, and other props.

The theater's restoration and modernization included its complete electrification, with the following features: colored lights on stage, lights in the orchestra pit so that musicians can see their scores, electric lighting on the main floor sitting and interior spaces, and even the exterior with illuminated advertising signs. The stained-glass windows adorning the theater's façade were designed by Adrià Gual, and the posters advertising the plays, featuring different calligraphic designs for each announced title, were painted by professional painters, including Graner himself, who also worked as the lighting designer for some of his early productions.

One of the most iconic elements of the new company's design would be the dramatic mask that crowns the theater's entrance gate, above which there is a wreath intersected by the four bars of the Catalan flag and a lyre. This mask is placed in the center of the lower border of a board in which the company's name is emblazoned, encircled by a garland made of roses. This logo will appear on all materials published by the company, such as librettos, programs, brochures, and advertising posters. Its symbolism is to be remarked, merging elements from the Classical world, such as the lyre and the theatrical mask as reminiscences of ancient Greek drama, as well as Catalan national symbols such as the legendary four bars painted by Gifré el Pilós that are portrayed on the medieval flag or the roses from Saint George's legend as the patron saint of Catalonia.

Graner also requested authorization from the Board to place a Catalan flag on the theater's façade as part of the decorative installation to commemorate the completion of the theater's renovation. He placed particular emphasis on the cultural, rather than political, nature of the gesture, emphasizing the artistic and educational objectives of his company. He extended an invitation to the members of the Hospital Board to attend performances at the Principal to demonstrate their support for his company. Some later articles dedicated to the company would recall the display of the Catalan flag as one of the notable events of this period:

> "[…] He [Lluís Graner] acquired the Principal theater and, under the name «Espectacles i Audicions Graner», began his oeuvre. At the top of the main façade there was the Catalan flag. […] Nothing greater or more beautiful has ever been done in Barcelona in other performances […][601]."

Other records from the period also attest to the prominent presence of the Catalan flag on the theater's façade throughout the five years that it remained under Graner's management, as evidenced by the chronicle of the visit of the Spanish king Alfonso XIII to Barcelona in 1908:

[601] La Veu de Catalunya (14/06/1919), p. 5 [originally in Catalan].

"Saluting the Catalan flag

> As Don Alfonso passed in front of the Principal theater, he noticed the Catalan flag that completely covered the balcony of the coliseum. He saluted it militarily as the procession continued on its way to the Church of La Merced. As the king passed along Las Ramblas, the bells of the cathedral and almost all the parishes began to ring[602]."

On October 10th, the list of new theater employees was announced: Pedro Bofill, José Domingo, Francisco Giner, Antonio Torrent, Salvador Ferrer, Isidro Albert, Miguel Castells; Ramón Jacas as general personnel manager; Lluís Via as stage manager. The season was scheduled to open on the 12th, although it was delayed due to complications in the installation of the pyrotechnic special effects for El comte l'Arnau[603].

❖ Salaries and commissions

Part of the company's artistic team moved to the Principal theater from the Mercè hall, also founded and directed by Lluís Graner. This relocation included stage director Adrià Gual and actors such as Artur Balot, Ramon Tor, Lluís Puiggarí, and Mercè Viola. Some of them came from amateur theater and had had their first professional experience at the Mercè hall. The Espectacles-Audicions Graner were, in fact, characterized by a mix of prestigious authors and performers, along with emerging talents from the younger generation. Joan B. Lambert and Josep Carner, who had also made their debut at the Mercè hall, were at that time two youngsters starting their professional careers alongside Lluís Graner, one as an orchestra conductor and the other as a poet and playwright. Actually, Lambert had a close personal relationship with the Graner family, and Carner was employed on a fixed salary to arrange the texts for the productions that Graner commissioned him to write[604].

A review of the available data regarding the financial management and salaries paid for direct commissions by the company reveals that Carner received 60 duros (300 pesetas) per month for his work as a literary arranger. As for Joan Llongueras, he was paid 8 duros (40 pesetas) for the composition of musical illustrations ("la cançó del malalt" ["the song of the ill one"]) for El malalt imaginari, the Catalan translation of Molière's French piece.

In numerous cases, composers did not complete their commissions, resulting in announced or programmed pieces that were eventually never performed. For instance, Joan Llongueras encountered challenges in orchestrating L'any mil [The year one thousand], which ultimately led him to relinquish the commission and seek guidance from Pedrell taking orchestration lessons with him[605]. The commission stipulated that the musical visions should span a duration of between 20 and 25 minutes, and a deadline of 20 days was typically allocated for their composition and submission to the company.

In other instances, the composer initially announced at the beginning of the season did not complete the piece, which had to be entrusted or reassigned to another composer. In such cases, Enric Morera served as a great backup composer, always available to assist the company at the last minute. Such happened with La santa espina [The holy thorn], for which Amadeu Vives was initially announced as the composer, ultimately not writing the music due to the disagreement with the economical return offered by Graner, based on a single commission instead of a percentage of every performance[606].

There are also cases in which previously written plays that had not been premiered at the time of their creation were recovered. One such example would be part of the repertoire of the Teatre Aulés program during the 1907/08 season. In other instances, the press announced that the materials to stage a play had arrived to the company or were even being rehearsed, without the play ultimately being premiered.

When authors submitted their pieces to the company to sell performance rights without a prefixed rate, the payments exhibited significant variation depending on the author's cachet. For instance, Jaume Nonell received 50 pesetas for selling the rights to the lyrical comedy La festa de les donzelles [The damsels' festivity] to the Espectacles-Audicions Graner company[607], while, during the same season, Enric Morera and Àngel Guimerà each received 1,000 pesetas for the transfer of the performance rights for one year of La reina vella [The old queen][608].

❖ Earnings and debts

Although the company enjoyed great success, it faced economic problems from the outset due to financial mismanagement. Graner closed the first season with a deficit of 50,000 pesetas, which he attributed to investments made to refurbish and adapt the theater. On July 18th, 1906, he appealed to the Hospital Board to lower the percentage of box office revenue they collected from 15% to 10%, arguing that they had received much more than the minimum 20,000 pesetas stipulated per year. The Board agreed to reduce the collection to 12%, maintaining it at 15% for off-season performances, such as those in the summer.

At the beginning of the following season, in October 1907, Graner will again request the same reduction to the 10%. He highlights the revitalization he has brought to the theater, which had been in decline both architecturally and in terms of the quality of the shows that were previously performed there. Graner asserts that his administration has successfully brought back the select audience that had ceased attending performances there due to the theater's distance from the new urban expansions where the higher classes had moved to. He emphasizes that his shows have been lauded as "works of culture and moral recognition", characterized as splendid and well-presented, and regarded as a moral and aesthetic success, as well as an economic one for the Board. However, for him, the productions had been "a real misfortune of an absolutely negative result" in financial terms.

Regarding the accumulated debt, Graner reproaches the Board for the fact that their revenue collection has increased significantly in comparison to the income previously received from past impresarios. The Board had already received 60,000 pesetas in box office revenue for the first two seasons; that is, 10,000 pesetas more per season than the stipulated minimum of 20,000, exceeding it by 50%. However, Graner reports a "real and effective" loss of 150,000 pesetas for the first two seasons.

If the first season concluded with a deficit of 50,000 pesetas, the second resulted in a deficit of 100,000, despite presenting overwhelming box office successes, such as La santa espina. This title remained on the billboard of the Principal theater for four months due to popular demand, being reprised on the following season for four more months, but it reportedly ruined the financial budget of the company due to the expenses that such a numerous staff on stage required.

This paradigmatic case works to reinforce the argument that the financial bankruptcy of the company was not due to poor artistic productions and the lack of public or popularity, as it had been suggested until now, but due to a business model that was structurally loss-making, in which even the sold-out sessions presented insufficient box income to cover the costs generated by each performance. The enforced policies of low-priced tickets to facilitate the access to the middle and working classes to a high-quality Catalan culture, along with the activist attitude of the impresario dedicated to invest his fortune to the national cause reviving its cultural attractive (as it was characteristic from the lyric movement, as Morera had done himself with his Teatre Líric Català) were not financially sustainable to be maintained in time without additional external income and sponsorship.

Titles such as La santa espina achieved the goal of creating symbolic references for the national culture that would persist on the popular imagery, as the recognized sardana from this piece proves, having become a national anthem until these days. They did not generate economic, but rather symbolic capital, which was the ultimate goal of the nationalist activists working in the cultural field. Despite the financial bankruptcy that Lluís Graner experience after his management of the Principal theater, he later on tried to go back to the theater business following his desire of spreading Catalan culture. Other leading figures of the movement, such as Enric Morera, maintained the same attitude, investing on Teatre Líric Català seasons whenever he had gathered enough savings to invest on it, as he did in 1901, 1910 and 1922.

Going back to the case of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, considering the substantial accumulated debt, the management was compelled to raise ticket prices for their third season and abandon the low-price policies that facilitated access for the middle and working classes. Until now, tickets to the Principal theater with a full orchestra and a large stage had cost the same as those to small variety halls with only quartet or quintet musical ensembles. A comparison with the prices offered by the competition clearly shows that the Principal theater offered an artificially lowered price, much lower than that of the Liceu opera house, other lyric theater seasons such as the Teatre Líric Català led by Morera, and even the city's main Catalan theater house, the Romea, which did not have an orchestra at all.

A comprehensive inventory and appraisal of the sets was conducted at the conclusion of the five-year contract, revealing that the expenditure on sets had amounted to at least 76,000 pesetas for the first two seasons, an extremely high amount compared to the investment dedicated by other theaters in the city such as the Liceu opera house[609]. Lluís Graner, who as a theater impresario had no back-up sets on storage, had routinely commissioned new sets and costumes for each production, intentionally requesting the use of superior quality materials. Therefore, confronted now with the necessity of budgetary reductions, the production team for the third season repurposed existing sets and engaged in minimal new commissions.

On October 8th, 1907, the Hospital Board resolved to maintain the 12% rate until revenue reached a minimum of 20,000 pesetas per year. Upon reaching this threshold, the rate was set to be reduced to 6% for both film screenings and theater performances. Given these quantities, it can be estimated that the initial season yielded approximately 200,000 pesetas in box office revenue, while the subsequent season grossed around 250,000. By calculating the conversion of these amounts and their equivalence according to historical Consumer Price Index (CPI) fluctuations, it can be determined that their current equivalent value would approximately be respectively 900,000 and 1,300,000 euros. Graner delegated the management of the company when his personal debt reached a sum currently equivalent to 680,000 euros.

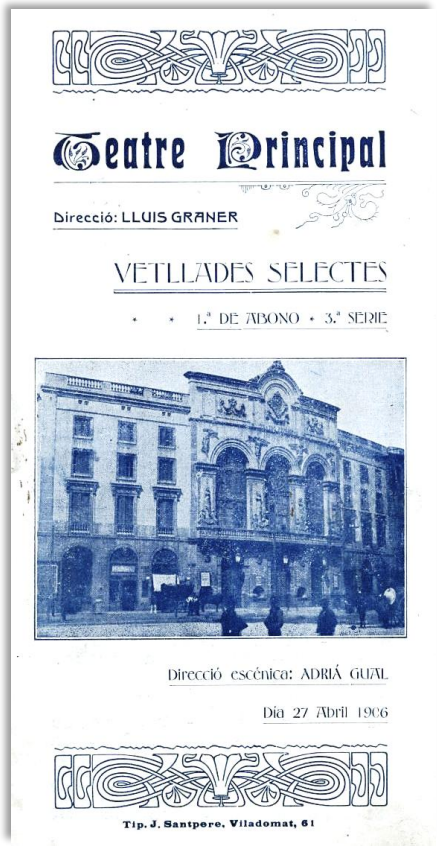
❖ Artistic direction and programming



Although the artistic direction of the theater was in the hands of Lluís Graner, who was the main economic sponsor of the enterprise and impresario in charge of the company operating the theater, he relied in the help and assistance of other artists. Besides the main program of lyric theater, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner also offered extraordinary sessions and some exclusive passes of non-musical theater performances, as well as seasons of musical concerts. Graner relied on the help from Adrià Gual as stage director to choose the program for the dramatic sessions. As for the musical concerts, Graner established a network of collaborations with other musical entities from the city, like Lluís Millet's choir and Joan Lamote's orchestra, to hold their concerts at the Principal theater. He not only leased the venue for them to perform but actually arranged conjoined events in which the Graner header often appeared on the printed programs.

As well, Graner's initial plan to mainly stage musical visions also changed with time. The influence of collaborators like Àngel Guimerà made him open up his program to lyric dramas, as well as the support of playwrights like Josep Morató or Eduard Aulés made him include several musical comedies, eventually announcing a whole line of programming dedicated to operetta. The following sections will analyze how each of the three seasons directed by Graner was structured, the repertoire that was programmed and how the programming tendency evolved and changed. As well, at the end of each season, a chart is provided listing all the titles played during the season in chronological order of their premieres, showing colored bars that indicate all the dates in which they were played throughout the season.

- 1905/06 season

The first season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, which was inaugurated on October 14th, 1905, focused its lyric theater offering on the genre of musical visions. Lluís Graner, its artistic director, had already experimented with it during the previous season at the Mercè hall. Adrià Gual, who had laid the theoretical foundations on which the new genre was based with his theory of "folk songs harmonized for the stage", was now transferred to the Principal theater from the Mercè hall. Two of his early lyric pieces based on folk songs were revived during this season for their premiere at the Principal theater.

The legendary vision El comte l'Arnau [Count Arnau] opened the season, generating great success due to its spectacular staging, which used colored lights, special effects, and even pyrotechnics on stage. The genre held a strong pictorial and visual character, based on the suggestion and creation of different atmospheres through the senses by combining visual, musical, and poetic effects, to which the audience was not accustomed. In titles whose dramaturgy was more rooted in the visual part along poetic texts, such as La matinada [The sunrise] or La Nit de Nadal [Christmas eve], critics pointed out the lack of dramatic action and narrative development, which is characteristic of avant-gardist Symbolism. For this reason, future musical visions have a more narrative literary character and will be more dependent on text.

Besides musical theater, the first half of the season featured "dilluns dramàtics" [dramatic Mondays], select evening season tickets, and "thés d'hivern" [winter teas] dedicated to spoken theater performances, continuing with the policies that characterized Gual's line at the Teatre Íntim. As the programmer of the non-musical theatrical repertoire, Gual emphasized the performance of major works from the international canon, both historical and contemporary, translated into Catalan, with an educational aim to cultivate the audience's cultural awareness. Among the authors represented are Ibsen, Hauptmann, and Bjørnson, interspersed with Shakespeare, Molière, and Cervantes, and even Greek classics such as Euripides and Sophocles.

Starting in February, new lyric productions began to alternate with reprises of the repertoire premiered at the Teatre Líric Català season that was arranged in 1901 by Enric Morera and Ignasi Iglésias at the Tívoli theater, including hits such as L'alegria que passa [The joy that passes by] and La reina del cor [The queen of the heart]. The folk songs harmonized for the stage by Adrià Gual, which premiered in the spring, were also quite successful, especially La presó de Lleida [The prison in Lleida] with music by Jaume Pahissa. These helped to consolidate the Symbolist approach to musical visions. The lyric repertoire gained considerable weight, and the non-musical theater was practically relegated to extraordinary sessions.

Another noteworthy aspect of the company's programming was its music concerts. Lluís Graner used his good relationship with Lluís Millet (which had already led to previous artistic collaborations at the Mercè hall) to organize a series of Lent concerts with the Orfeó Català at the Principal theater. The Orquestra Filharmònica Barcelonesa, conducted by Josep Lassalle, also found a good ally in Lluís Graner, who shared his desire to bring the international symphonic repertoire to the Barcelona public, an educational task parallel to that proposed by Gual with the dramatic repertoire. Music by composers such as Mozart, Beethoven, Händel, and Haydn was performed at the Principal theater, in some cases for the first time in Spain. The Associació Musical de Barcelona also played an intermediary role as organizer of the concert series at the venue, programming artists such as Pau Casals, Joan Manen, and Joan Massià, as well as some prominent international performers such as pianist Ignacy Paderewski and violinist Mathieu Crickboom.

Figure 177: Cover of the program for the concert organized by the Associació Musical de Barcelona in collaboration with the Espectacles-Audicions Graner in March 5th, 1906. [Private collection].

Weeks before the season opened, there had been speculation about who would be the musical director. The names of Enric Morera, Francesc Pujol, and Joan Lambert were announced. The latter was already working as a pianist at the Mercè hall and was ultimately chosen as the musical director of the Principal theater for the entire duration of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. In fact, Lambert had ties to the traditionalist and Carlist youth of Barcelona, an ideology he shared with Lluís Graner; it was even said at the time that he was engaged to one of Lluís Graner's daughters, until the painter went into exile in America and the engagement was called off.

As for Gual, he left the company's team at the end of the season after an argument with Graner about the financial imbalance it was causing him, suggesting that he was actually dismissed by the impresario[610]. As director of the Teatre Íntim, Gual was aware of the budgetary dramas involved in theater production and did not want to be part of the financial ruin he foresaw for his friend Graner. It should be noted that, although the press linked the activities of the Teatre Íntim to the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, there was no formal relationship between the two companies. Gual, as stage director of the Principal theater, programmed according to his ideals of importing foreign theater and reviving the classics, just as he did privately with his Íntim company, but they never joined forces, nor did any of the Principal's productions bear the Íntim label or mention of responsibility.

Figure 178: Flyer from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner announcing La presó de Lleida by Adrià Gual. It also included a note with a biography of the artist. [CDMAE: record 406935].

Regarding Enric Morera, he wrote many of the scores for the season's premieres, but he never held any position of musical direction or programming. During this period, he lived in Sitges, and all the scores for his original music written under commission for the shows at the Principal theater are signed from Sitges. Therefore, as in the case of Gual, Morera's company, Teatre Líric Català, also had no connection with or responsibility for the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Morera worked exclusively as a composer who was commissioned to write music for the programmed works, and in some cases he also introduced artists from his circle of contacts to Lluís Graner in order to establish new collaborations, as was the case with Àngel Guimerà. He as well ceded the repertoire of his previous company at the Tívoli theater to be performed by the Principal company, but without direct participation in the management of the company.

The season ended on June 4th, and a summer season began based exclusively on cinematographic projections. Ticket prices were reduced during the summer to 0.25 pesetas for general seats and 2 pesetas for boxes with 6 tickets.

This second season, with Modest Urgell taking over from Adrià Gual as stage director, there is a shift towards comic genres, bringing together different theatrical trends within Catalan culture while moving away from the focus on musical visions that characterized the first season.

While the previous season featured a combination of musical visions and spoken theater sessions, this one leaves aside non-musical theater to shift its programming toward exclusively lyric theater, but more dramatic instead of suggestive and including a greater diversity of genres in the program. Musical visions will now include more action and will be closer to lyric drama. These were alternated with operettas or lyrical comedies, lyric dramas such as the tale La santa espina [The holy thorn], and even large-scale operas closer to Wagnerian style were included, such as Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel.

Although the change in stage direction may have contributed to this shift in programming, the socio-political context of the time also played a role. It is important to bear in mind the events reported in the office of the newspaper Cu-cut![611] and the consequent birth of Solidaridad Catalana as a political coalition of different Catalanist parties. In the cultural field, a clear parallel to this political coalition can be seen in the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, which also attempted to bring together the different theatrical proposals of Catalan lyric theater within its programming, thus establishing the Principal theater as a space for the meeting and unification of cultural Catalanism.

Thus, we can still find the hallmark of musical visions (such as La dama d'Aragó [The lady of Aragon] and La resurrecció de Llàtzer [The resurrection of Lazarus]). These were interspersed with lyrical dramas that maintain the company's characteristic thematic line (whether religious or legendary, as with Gaziel and Nit de Reis [The Three Wise Men eve]), fables developed as large-scale lyric works (La santa espina and La nina dormida al bosc [The girl sleeping at the woods]) and also musical comedies, many of them adaptations or "transplants" into Catalan of French works (such as Permeti'm! [Allow me!], Innocència [Innocence] and L'ajudant [The helper]).

In terms of the structure of the season, there is a clear distinction between the fall and winter terms. Inaugurated on September 20th, 1906, the first half of the season was notable for the great success and long run of Nit de Reis [The Three Wise Men eve]. The premiere of new works was interspersed with reprises from the previous season (such as Els tres tambors [The three drummers] and La presó de Lleida) and lyrical works from the repertoire of Morera's Teatre Líric Català, like La reina del cor and Picarol.

After the Three Kings festivities in January, La santa espina, written by Àngel Guimerà with music by Enric Morera, kicked off the second half of the season and captured much of the attention, remaining on the theater's billboard for the rest of the season. The programming of reprises of previous titles was left aside from then on. To celebrate the 100th performance of La santa espina, a new musical vision was commissioned from the same authors. Although El cavaller Sant Jordi was initially announced, the authors finally delivered an adaptation of a scene from their drama Jesús de Nazaret (1894) adding a couple of new musical numbers, entitled La resurrecció de Llàtzer. Looking ahead to spring, Ton i Guida (the Catalan translation of Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel) and La nina dormida al bosc by Manuel de Montoliu and Frederic Alfonso renewed the repertoire, maintaining the format of large-scale lyrical fables.

This was the moment of greatest prestige and visibility for the company. Numerous articles about La santa espina and La nina dormida al bosc appeared in newspapers, even in the ones edited in Madrid, including photographs of scenes from the plays, which showcased the Espectacles-Audicions Graner as one of the main promoters of Catalan theater. It is also worth noting the amount of promotional material that was published for La santa espina (photographs, postcards, portraits, etc.) and the publication of the score for the sardana number, which still lives on in the musical imagination of Catalonia.

Towards the end of the season, special performances were held to benefit the various actors in the company, with several non-musical extraordinary performances and some reprises of previous plays to diversify the program as the season was drawing to a close. It should be noted that spoken theater, which had been very present during the previous season with select evenings passes, was hardly seen at all until the last days of the season. Only the "thés d'hivern" sessions were maintained, and instead, many more music concerts were scheduled. Renowned musicians like pianists Joaquim Malats, Édouard Risler and Raoul Pugno, soprano Maria Gay and violinists Joan Massià and Joan Manen gave concerts during this season at the Principal theater. The female participation as concert soloist is especially remarkable, with pianists Esperança Forés, Júlia Sicard, Wanda Landowska and Helène Morsztyn.

Therefore, the theater's offerings were now more specialized in the musical repertoire, both in terms of lyric theater productions and concerts. It followed criticism that at the end of the previous season pointed to the need for the Principal theater to specialize in musical genres while the Romea theater did so in dramatic genres. At this point, both were positioned as the city's "Catalan theaters" in the public eye, with regular transfers of actors between their companies and joint summer touring seasons, although historically the Principal theater had been in direct competition with the Gran Teatre del Liceu as opera houses, a duality that seems now disappeared from public discourse.

Despite the resounding success of some of its productions, the company owner's financial problems and debts grew due to the shows' losses. According to some accounts, the success of La santa espina was also the company's downfall, because the number of musicians and actors needed on stage to perform it generated enormous expenses that even sold-out tickets revenue could not cover with such low seat prices. In addition, the programming of large-scale lyric fables forced a reduction in the number of daily sessions due to their longer length, which also meant fewer tickets sold.

On May 21st, 1907, the summer season opened, offering only film screenings. Tickets for general seats cost 1 real, while boxes with six tickets cost 2 pesetas.

This third season consolidated the commitment to comedy productions that had already been hinted at during the previous season, leaving musical visions in a secondary place in favor of musical comedies. Lluís Graner's departure from the company's artistic direction and the new stage direction led by actor Enric Giménez favored this change in programming. Until then, the stage directors had been painters, which had a more plastic and poetic vision. In addition, during the spring of 1908, the company ended up abandoning musical shows altogether in favor of only-spoken theater.

The program announced at the beginning of the season already planned a mix of "visions and operettas," declaring the intention to promote the comic musical repertoire. In November, the press confirmed that Lluís Graner was no longer the artistic director of the Principal theater for this season, but it is unclear to what extent he had prepared or mediated to structure the upcoming program. Be that as it may, the planned balance was destabilized, with the removal of several musical vision titles from production, many of which had already been written.

Thus, commissions for musical visions that had been already written (like Barcelona by J. Lapeira) were abandoned, as were the revivals of pre-existing titles that had not yet been premiered (such was the case of L'estudiant de Vic [The student from Vic] by Adrià Gual). Even some titles that had been announced during the season as upcoming premieres (La filla del carmesí [The Crimson Lord's daughter] by Manuel Marinel·lo and Amadeu Argelaga) never made it to the stage. Some of them, such as La presó de Xauxa [The prison in Xauxa] by Apel·les Mestres and Jaume Borràs de Palau, were later premiered by other companies. Other cases that were only partially written, as the case of Margaridó by Apel·les Mestres, had a printed edition of the libretto published, without the music that Amadeu Vives never arrived to write.

Some of them were old works written years ago and left unperformed, such as Les roselles [The poppies] (a 1900 manuscript probably written for Morera's season of Teatre Líric Català) or some comedies included in the Teatre Aulés subscription. Others were translations and adaptations, mostly from French, such as T'estimo! [I love you!] and Com unes malves [Like mallows], both by Lluís Puiggarí.

The season can be clearly divided into three parts. The fall term, from the premiere of Joan de l'Ós [Bear John] to the Three Kings festivity, is when most musical premieres take place. Comedies stand out (from Els entremaliats, A peu pla, No diguis blat... and La dida seca to the bilingual parody for April Fools' Day, Il castello di Malastruga).

Besides the comic genre, only El fill del rei [The King's son] was a musical vision staging a folk song; Joan de l'Ós, a lyric fable; and Rodamon [Vagabond], a drama with legendary and medieval air. Religious and Christmas-themed works are still present in this season, but they now have a more comical and narrative tone, as in the case of El portal de Betlem [Bethlehem's portal] by Alfons Maseras and Adrià Esquerrà, definitively abandoning the poetic and evocative dramaturgy of earlier seasons. Works depicting local customs also adopt a comedic tone, such as Els gendarmes o qui vigila no dorm [The police officers or who guards doesn't sleep] by Josep Morató and Celestí Sadurní, that familiarizes the public with the Catalan dialect of what's considered "Northern Catalonia" (currently Southeastern France) through a comic plot of policemen investigating the theft of hens in a farm.

The winter program will drastically reduce the number of musical titles on the billboard, focusing on the reprise of La santa espina and the successful premiere of La reina vella [The old queen], once again betting on the Morera-Guimerà duo. Enric Morera's public profile at the Principal theater was such at this time that even the Liceu opera house attempted to counterprogram the new premiere of La reina vella with a reprise of Morera's opera Empòrium, which, however, was not very successful due to a lack of investment in the production.

No new musical comedies were premiered during the winter, with the comic repertoire focusing on spoken theater. As for musical visions, the new premieres (El miracle de santa Agnès [Saint Agnès's miracle], La llar [Home], and El testament d'Amèlia [Amèlia's will]) will be poorly received. They were criticized for their technical quality and dramaturgical inconsistencies, forcing some fragments of the texts to be rewritten after opening night. None of them, in fact, were published in the collection of librettos edited by the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

Figure 183: Flyer announcing an extraordinary evening in honor of actress Maria Morera, who would be playing the main character of La reina vella*. [CDMAE: record 527537].*

The spring program lasted from April to mid-June, featuring only-spoken theater performances. Notably, the drama El detective Sherlock Holmes [The Detective Sherlock Holmes] translated from English, practically held a permanent presence in the program. The orchestra was probably dismissed entirely; some afternoon sessions were even devoted solely to cinema. In fact, the musical activity of the season, which had occupied a significant part of the program during the previous season, was reduced to a series of four concerts by the Barcelona Philharmonic Orchestra with conductor Josep Lassalle and a few special concerts in the spring by Emili Sauer and Miecio Horszowski.

The 1907/08 season particularly promoted seasonal passes for private evenings, which were organized by entities of great ideological diversity that had gathered around the Principal theater since the beginning of the aforementioned Solidaritat Catalana nationalist coalition. The fall and winter programming hosted evenings dedicated to the members of the Centre Nacionalista Republicà [Nationalist Republican Centre] and the Joventut Carlista [Carlist Youth] on different days of the week, the latter even celebrating the Don Carlos de Borbón Day at the Principal theater. In addition, several series of Tertúlies barcelonines [Barcelona gatherings] were also organized, as well as a special Teatre Aulés season ticket, with premieres and reprises of comedies (with and without music) by playwright Eduard Aulés. In the spring, the theater focused on holding performances to benefit the company's actors and actresses, with only one final season ticket remaining active for the Joventut Carlista's "divendres blancs" or "white Fridays".

The company's financial problems continued to worsen irremediably, accumulating more debts that ended up jeopardizing the payment of the theater's rent. The main cut was made in the set design. If during the first seasons the company's main attraction was the visual aspect of the shows (multiple new sets for each production, luxurious costumes, and live special and pyrotechnic effects), during this season practically no new sets were announced. Not even for La reina vella, the season's greatest production, was all the scenery commissioned as new.

Although two new backdrops were painted, the first scene reused Brunet i Pous's backdrop for La dama d'Aragó (1906/07) and in the remaining scenes we can identify a pastiche of new and reused elements, such as the chapel in the second scene, which comes from Oleguer Junyent's design for the first scene of El comte l'Arnau (1905/06).

The following season, 1908/09, Graner made his definitive departure from the theater. He transferred the management of the venue to Antoni Niubó and Enrique Vinyals, although he had to continue as the person ultimately responsible for the financial results and the payment of the theater rent, as he was the signatory of the lease contract. For the remaining two seasons of the contract, the theater's marquee changed its header to "Teatre Català," dropping the surname "Graner" from the company's name. The same troupe of actors remained as the resident company, now directed by Jaume Borràs, but the orchestra remained dismissed, officially abandoning musical and lyrical theater programming.

In the following chart, we can clearly observe how the initial primacy of musical visions was replaced in this second season by lyric drama, while in the third season operettas became the lead musical genre along the final shift in spring to only spoken theater:

For each season, the first bar presents the percentual proportion of titles performed by genre, while the second bar presents that of total performances grouped by genre. In the first season, a large volume of spoken theater was premiered, but these were single performances, while musical visions stayed for longer in the program even if quantitatively these amounted to less titles. In the second season, it's lyric drama the genre that is performed the most, in total and in relation to the number of titles premiered. For the third season, the predominant musical genre is operetta, although the shift to non-musical theater for the last months of the season eventually makes it the most performed genre of the season. The chart that follows shows the total number of days each play was performed grouped by genre:

❖ The Principal theater after Graner's lease

Despite the delegation of both artistic and administrative management, and even having removed his surname from the header of the company that operated the Principal theater, Graner continued to receive fines and financial penalties as the ultimate responsible party for being the signatory of the lease contract. For instance, he was levied a fine of 50 pesetas for allowing spectators to smoke inside the theater, in addition to the costs of a mandatory renovation to comply with new fire regulations.

In light of the escalating disputes, the Hospital Board designated Ricardo Canals as the new theater comptroller in January 1909, appointing him with the role of mediating between Graner and the Board in successive financial disagreements. For instance, in February, the Board demanded 1,000 pesetas from Graner due to his failure to hand over the agreed percentage of box office revenues. At that time, Graner still owed 2,188.25 pesetas to cover the rent of the current season, a sum that was finally agreed to be deducted from the deposit paid at the beginning of the contract.

Faced with the need to increase his income, on March 9th Graner asked the Board for permission to consolidate the transfer of the company operating the theater to Enrique Vinyals and Antoni Niubó, who had already been in charge of artistic direction since the previous season. Permission was granted on May 9th, 1909, and Graner returned to the field of painting. At the end of the year, exhibitions of his pieces were organized at the Parés gallery and the Societat Artística i Literària. In early 1910 he moved temporarily to America, where he resumed painting to pay off the suffocating debts awaiting him in Barcelona, exhibiting in New York and receiving commissions from Washington, Boston, and Chicago.

> Last March, the eminent Catalan painter Lluís Graner, who, as our readers know, is spending some time in New York, opened an exhibition of his works at the famous Brandus Gallery located in that great American capital. Given the high praise from critics, the exhibition could not have been more successful, and, if we add to this the invitations he receives every day to send pieces to Washington, Boston, Chicago, and other American cities, we can fairly say that the artist has made a successful start in the United States.
> The renowned American critic Mr. Joseph Edgar Chamberlin published a lengthy and highly laudatory article on Graner's work in The Evening Mail, entitled "Another vigorous Spanish painter, Mr. Graner of Barcelona."
> The American Art News also praised the Catalan artist effusively in a long article entitled "Lluís Graner and his work". In addition to illustrations, such as a portrait of the painter and some of his exhibited canvases, the aforementioned article contains praising opinions about the Barcelona master, filling more than three columns, each with its own heading: «An original painter», «An observer of character», «Painter of the night and in the studio», and «Honors paid to the master»[612]."

[612] La Veu de Catalunya 3937 (21/04/1910), morning edition, p. 4 [originally in Catalan].

On September 20th, 1909, when the last season of the contract was due to begin, the Board demanded to receive the pending revenue of the box office takings, threatening to withhold authorization for the theater's opening if the stipulated financial obligation was not met. It was further noted that the funds previously withdrawn from the deposit had to be restored. The situation worsened in October when the Board reminded them that they had to hire a security guard to ensure that regulations were being followed in the theater, particularly the smoking ban, which also required the presence of two firefighters during performances.

When the final day of the contract arrived on May 30th of 1910, Graner still owed about 4,000 pesetas out of the stipulated 20,000 corresponding to the last season. He requested pardon, citing the financial ruin caused by the theater debts, which had culminated in his bankruptcy. Moreover, he added that with the lease contract now concluded, he found himself with no means of generating new earnings to address his debts. Upon the final liquidation of the last season in July 1910, the following sums remained unresolved: 16,212.15 pesetas corresponding to 12% of the revenue; 2,811.75 pesetas to reallocate the previous debt that was taken from the deposit; 976.10 pesetas to reach the minimum annual rent of 20,000, and, in addition, 5,470.21 pesetas due in stamp duty.

Faced with this situation, Lluís Graner proposed to the Board the sale of his company's collection of stage sets, which were still housed within the theater, for 30,000 pesetas. The offer was made under the assumption that the sets were made of superior-quality materials and could be reused for a prolonged period. However, the impresarios to whom he had delegated the company's management had pawned some of the sets as deposits for their own debts while Graner was touring North America as a painter, precisely to raise funds to cover his own pending payments. For this reason, Graner found himself unable to lend the production of Ton i Guida —which was being planned to be reprised in Vic for the Balmes festivities in August 1910— due to its confiscation[613].

This series of events prompted Graner to initiate legal proceedings against the aforementioned businessmen, alleging their misappropriation of his property. The case was pursued by his lawyers and attorneys, A. Puig i Subirana and Francisco de P. Figueras i Sagués, as Graner had returned to America. In February 1911, the court ordered the return of the assets to the rightful owner, thereby lifting the seizure of Graner's sets on the grounds that they had been illegally pawned in the name of Vinyals and Niubó.

Meanwhile, the materials still in the theater had been inventoried for sale, and in August 1910, Maurici Vilomara appraised the sets and costumes. He estimated that Graner had spent approximately 76,000 pesetas on them, but since the designs had been made specifically for very particular plays, they would be difficult to reuse and could reach a maximum of 38,250 pesetas. Alternatively, if they were valued as reusable wood and fabric for building other sets, their value would amount to only 12,750 pesetas.

[613] NADAL, Lluís B. (1911): Crònica de les festes del centenari d'en Balmes. Vic: Gazeta Montanyesa, pp. 160–163.

In the final days of 1910, the Board ultimately resolved to allocate 15,000 pesetas for the sets and 875 pesetas for the rest of Graner's belongings that remained in the theater. However, a deduction of 1,250 pesetas was made due to the misplacement of the set for Nit de Reis, while an additional 5,470.21 pesetas that the Hospital had paid on Graner's behalf for stamp duty and other taxes were subtracted, as well as 74 pesetas for the due wage of stagehand Pedro Roger. Therefore, Graner ended up receiving only 9,080.79 pesetas. Notwithstanding, he still had 5,470.21 pesetas left to pay to the Public Treasure, and, according to particular testimonies, it seems that he also left debts to other set designers and painters.

Following the termination of the lease contract of the Principal theater, and confronted with the impossibility of meeting the payments still owed, Lluís Graner found himself compelled to return to America seeking exile until practically the end of his life. Despite all, perhaps encouraged by news of Morera's comeback as an impresario with a last season of Teatre Líric Català in 1922, Graner asked Àngel Guimerà the following year —recalling their friendship, which had begun with his Principal theater project— to lend him the rights to one of his plays. Graner's intention was to produce its staging in the United States, moved by his passional desire to increase the visibility of Catalan culture abroad, but it seems that they eventually did not reach any agreement[614].

His return to Barcelona in 1928, 18 years after his departure, was celebrated and met with widespread enthusiasm by the press. The painter provided an account of his life in Barcelona, acknowledging that, despite the great artistic and economic success of the Mercè hall, the Principal theater project had irreparably ruined his finances. Despite the company's considerable bankruptcy, it had provided the city with a major theatrical attraction that was chronicled by the press for decades as one of the major milestones of Catalan theater in the city and as the primary project for the institutionalization of Catalan lyric theater. During its three-season run, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner staged a total of 55 lyrical theater productions in Catalan.

Its influence was such that even the genre of musical visions initiated by Lluís Graner became the benchmark for symbolist theater in Catalonia. Consequently, when other symbolist productions later arrived in the city—as was the case with those by Gregorio Martínez Sierra and María Lejárraga in 1917—the press and popular opinion compared them with this repertoire and undoubtedly announced them as "musical visions"[615].

As for the Catalan theater company that Graner had established and consolidated at the Principal theater, the following years proved to be turbulent. Following the expiration of Graner's contract and after a series of brief summer leases under the impresarios Josep Tarrés i Haase and Vicenç Alexandre i Beses, the tender for the next five-year lease (1910–1915) declared Ramon Franqueza i Comas as the new impresario. Initially, the Principal theater continued to operate as "Teatre Català" maintaining the offer of Catalan repertoire. The theater remained occupied by the same company, under the direction of Jaume Borràs, with his brother Enric Borràs as the lead actor. However, Franqueza would abandon the "Teatre Català" project in the summer of 1912:

> The bramble can only prick you, and this businessman [Ramon Franqueza], both disastrous and amusing, who put the dignity of our dramatic art in a precarious situation, could do nothing else, as a shameful culmination of his task, but sell the Teatre Català at public auction. He could not do the same with the authors or the plays: he had already abused everyone's enthusiasm and good faith enough to turn them into business material. [...] But spite and impotence were eating away at [614] The correspondence between the two that corroborates this fact can be found in the Biblioteca de Catalunya, Àngel Guimerà collection, box 32 (correspondence, box 2).

them, and now a set designer, now that actor or the other one had to complain about the eternal inconsiderateness of this businessman [...]

Finally, faced with his obvious impotence, when he saw that without the support of those he had always treated so badly it was impossible for him to continue, the man decided to completely wash his hands of the theater of the motherland and, to crown his decision, with a contemptuous gesture, like a sad manifestation of defeat, he tore down the board with which he had once sought to deceive the unwary by placing it on the balcony of the Principal theater. Without any respect for the legend it bore, without any consideration for what the two words and the glorious coat of arms that accompanied them represented, he took it home to a ragman and haggled over its price, as if it were scrap metal from the Bellcaire fair. [...]

It is a low blow, a miserable insult to our enthusiasm; it is a stupid mockery of our passion made by someone who has only become wealthy with Catalan theater. The sign of the Teatre Català, which should have been the banner of a noble art but instead became his public shame, is about to be taken away by rag-and-bone men or destroyed by inclement weather. [...][616]"

Despite anticipating higher profits from the theater in Castilian, Ramon Franqueza terminated his rental lease by requesting financial benevolence comparable to that requested by Graner. Franqueza found himself unable to cover the final year's rent, even though in previous seasons the profits obtained by the Hospital Board had been well above the stipulated minimum. However, this time, the factors contributing to this decline included a decrease in audience attendance due to the hostile climate in the city caused by the Great War.

[616] El teatre català 22 (27/07/1912), pp. 2–3 [originally in Catalan].

The acting company that Graner had established at the Principal —now directed by Jaume Borràs, with his brother Enric Borràs as the leading actor— considered these events to be a betrayal and a public disdain to Catalan culture on the part of the impresario. Therefore, when the time came to put the theater up for lease again, Jaume Borràs himself submitted a bid to compete with Franqueza's renewal and ultimately won the tender. The building was being refurbished to reopen again as "Teatre Català" when the historic fire of 1915 occurred:

> "[...] Work began on the embellishment of the hall and restoration of the stage, using varnish and oil, without realizing that these are dangerous elements in a theater. In addition, a backdrop was painted on the stage itself and the windows facing the Lyon d'Or were left wide open so that it would dry faster. During the five years that I owned the theater, these windows were never opened, either in summer or winter. One would have had to see how the flames came out of the Lyon's chimney at night to immediately guess how one of those wisps, with the windows open, went over that curtain, causing the fire, which, moreover, found good fuel in Graner's sets that were piled up at the foot of the windows. [...]
> Ramon Franqueza[617]."

It was precisely the curtains and sets from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner era that the Hospital had purchased to cover Graner's debt, which had remained stored as the theater's back-up sets, that initiated the fire.

During the fire of 1915, the entire collection and archive of the Principal theater were destroyed. The theater was completely burned down and in 1918 it had to be demolished, leaving only the façade standing.

Chapter 9:
Partnered network of venues across the region

The new genre of "musical visions" premiered at the Mercè hall, which was inaugurated in 1904 by Lluís Graner at Rambla dels Estudis in Barcelona. The painter, emulating the model of entertainment venues with cinema, variety shows, and art installations, established the Mercè hall as an experimental project.

His aim was to offer these popular formats, with short sessions and affordable ticket prices, from an artistic and moral perspective, standpoint, thereby enhancing their intellectual content. The intention was to consolidate the space as a cultural center accessible to both the working-class and bourgeois families that presented shows in line with Catholic morality and attractive to children, but at the same time visually and aesthetically appealing.

He engaged in experimentation with the production of both fiction and documentary films, combining staged scenes with voiceovers. He directed theatrical performances incorporating electric lights of various colours and intensities with music and poetry (known as "musical visions") with dramaturgies based on sensorial suggestion. The basement floor, designed by Gaudí to emulate a cave, also contained art installations. The monumental nativity scenes were particularly striking, becoming an annual tradition at the hall that served as a visual attraction with the intention of repopularizing this Christmas tradition.

The team that formed around the Mercè hall included Lluís Graner as owner, sponsor, and artistic director; Josep Carner as lyricist and playwright; Adrià Gual as stage director and theater programmer; Joan Baptista Lambert as pianist and musical director; and Antoni Ros i Güell as plastic artist and set designer. The success of the venue was such that the intellectual circle closest to his team expanded the initiative by creating a network of similar halls across Catalonia. With the Mercè hall serving as the creative hub from which the proposals radiated, other venues were set up in Girona, Terrassa, and Sabadell with Graner's support.

Rafael Masó, a close friend of Josep Carner, became acquainted with the initiative taking place in Barcelona while studying in the Catalan capital. Upon returning to his native Girona, he established the Gerió hall there with the support of the Centre Moral Gironí and his brother Narcís. The new venue opened its doors in April 1906. The musical vision of L'oració de la nit [The night prayer], premiered there, enjoyed a long run as a piece in the children's repertoire including gestural choreography during its performance based on the Dalcroze pedagogy.

Shortly thereafter, in October 1906, the painter Joaquim Vancells, a member of the same artistic and Catholic circles as Graner, inaugurated the Ars-Lucis gallery in Terrassa. He enjoyed the close support of Joan Llongueras, who was also a close friend of the Masó brothers from Girona. Llongueras, who had also established professional relations with Lluís Graner, was a collaborator of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. In addition to personal friendship and cultural influence, stage collaborations were established between this circuit of venues, which came to share part of their repertoire. For instance, the Ars-Lucis hall hosted musical visions previously premiered at the Mercè and the Gerió halls, as well as newly written titles.

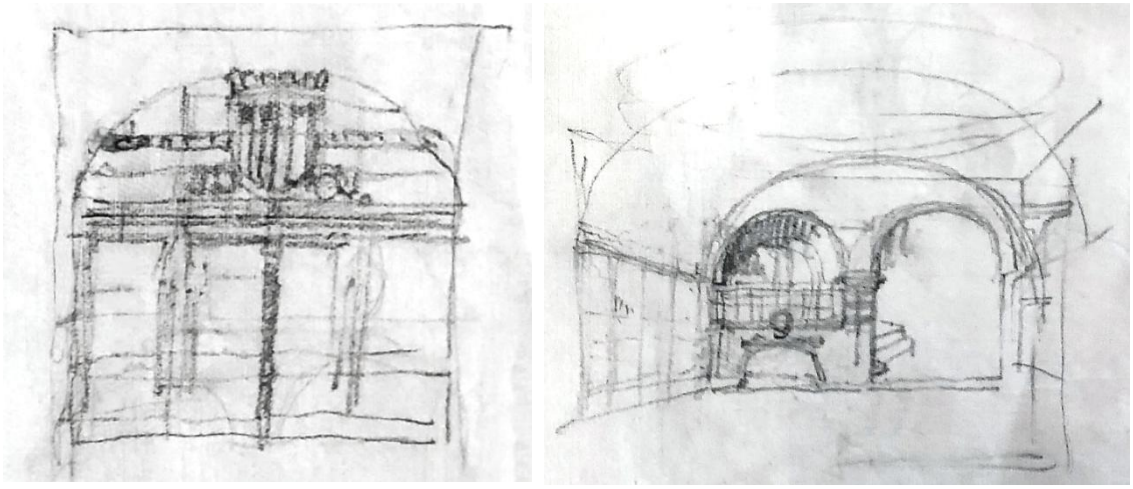
At the start of the following season, in October 1907, an attempt was made to establish another venue in the neighboring city of Sabadell. The "Saló Artístic" or Artistic hall was inaugurated in the building of the Catholic Association of Sabadell. The commencement of its activities was facilitated by the direct support of Lluís Graner, who provided not only the texts and scores of three of his musical visions from the Mercè hall, but also the scenery and costumes. The Artístic hall produced two more musical visions prior to the conclusion of the season, written by anonymous local authors from Sabadell.

The forced closure of the Mercè hall by government order undoubtedly had an impact on the continuity of the rest of venues in the network, which soon after ended up ceasing their activities. However, a final attempt was made to maintain the musical vision genre present in Barcelona following the transfer of the Mercè hall to new proprietors in 1910 and the permanent exile of Lluís Graner from Catalonia.

In September 1911, Baldomer Marinel·lo, who had been the leading actor at the Mercè hall company (and had also directed its tour at the Reus Reading Center in 1908), installed his company at the Imperi hall to offer a season of musical visions. He received notable support from his brother, Manuel Marinel·lo, who collaborated as a librettist, and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, who did so as a composer. Both had previous experience in the genre, as they had writen various musical visions for Graner's companies. Other collaborators who wrote musical visions for the Imperi hall also came from between the former collaborators of the Mercè hall, such as Joan B. Lambert, Adrià Esquerrà, or Rafael Nogueras Oller. However, the company only operated the venue from September 1911 to January 1912, later moving to the Catalanist Centre Gent Nova, but abandoning the musical visions project.



Similarly, Antoni Ros i Güell persisted in his involvement with the plastic installations that had become popular at the grottos of the Mercè hall, even opting to relocate the project when the original Mercè hall was closed down permanently by court order. As well, the film activity at the hall was continued by the Hispano Films company, where Adrià Gual worked as a film director, supposing his comeback to the Mercè hall after his first period there as a stage director for the inaugural season.

However, the scattering of the activities without the sole leadership of Lluís Graner, in addition to the restrictions imposed by the local administration, meant that the original project of the Mercè hall as a multidisciplinary recreational venue was irretrievable. In a similar manner, its regional network of theater and movie halls collapsed when it lost the Mercè hall's central support, which included the exclusive distribution of imported art films and the itineracy of new stage productions.

❖ Saló Gerió (Girona)

The renovation of the Centre Moral Gironí —located on the Saint Augustí square, now known as Independence square— along with the construction of its new auditorium, were projected at least since the summer of 1905. At that time, Rafael Masó, the architect that led the project and who became the hall's artistic director, engaged in discussions with his colleague Josep Carner concerning the "Saló Gerió" or Geryon hall[618]. Masó graduated from the Architecture School of Barcelona in 1906 and then moved back to his city of origin, Girona, becoming the "Saló Gerió" one of his first architectural projects. The name of the hall draws back to the foundational myth of the city of Girona, whose protagonist is the three-headed giant Geryon that fought Heracles.

The design of the stage, the projection booth, the entrance gates, and the ticket office were modeled after Gaudí's design for the Mercè hall, using concrete to replicate the texture of rocks and iron structures[619]. Actually, Masó professed a devotion for Gaudí on the early stage of his career and he directly imitated his design of the Mercè hall for the Geryon hall project, as can be seen in Masó's sketches. Additionally, a modern lighting system with colored electric bulbs would be incorporated and the main floor in front of the stage was inclined to offer an optimal visual clarity of the stage from the rear.

Masó was acquainted with the Mercè hall during his student days in Barcelona through his close friend Josep Carner, who worked there as a playwright and dramaturgical arranger with a fixed salary between 1904 and 1906. Furthermore, he shared artistic networks with the director of the Mercè hall and main promoter of the genre of musical visions in Barcelona, Lluís Graner. They both were members of the Artists' Circle of Saint Lluc[620], along with Antoni Gaudí, who had designed the Mercè hall. Moreover, Masó was part the religious associations Lliga Espiritual de la Mare de Déu de Montserrat and attended the meetings of the Acadèmia Catalanista, led by Torras i Bages[621], who has been identified as one of the ideological influences for Graner's projects, linking Catalan and Christian identities and promoting the use of theater as a tool of spreading these ideas.

The hall was officially inaugurated on April 28th, 1906, inside the building of the Moral Centre of Girona, which also had a café on the lower floor. The room that hosted the stage was 100 m^2 and it could host up to 150 people in the audience. From the artistic team, we only know that Rafael Masó was the artistic director, Ramon Adroher was in charge of the cinematographic direction, and Narcís Masó (Rafael's brother), as well as other "various young members of the Moral Centre[622]", integrated the management team. It is also worth mentioning the personal involvement of the musical trio that performs on the sessions of the Geryon hall, formed by Isidre Mollera, Tomàs Mollera, and Josep M.ª Dalmau. For the lyrical performances that needed a larger orchestra, Isidre Mollera put together a quintet or sextet directed by himself that was to be placed in the pit beneath the stage[623].

The new hall and the company installed there shared the same name. However, other entities organize activities in the hall as well, such as the Moral Center's amateur dramatic troupe. Actually, it was the actors from this group who performed in the Geryon hall's productions, as did their children in the musical visions. The Geryon hall's first season featured the largest theatrical and cultural program organized by the Geryon company's own initiative in the Moral Center auditorium.

The programing was fundamentally based on musical visions, censored cinema projections according to Catholic morality, photography projections of popular and religious activities, the narration of fables for children, folk music concerts, and dramatic performances. Morning sessions were specifically scheduled for children, and a seasonal pass to the "selected evenings" was also offered for high-standing members of the audience. Therefore, the hall did not only emulate the architectural design of the Mercè hall in Barcelona, but also its cultural offer.

Both the Barcelona company and the new Girona initiative had a shared ideological purpose. Specifically, both entities seek to offer modern and aesthetically attractive shows based on Catalan folklore, presented in Catalan language and following Catholic moral guidelines. The sessions are brief and low-priced, making them accessible to popular classes. The shows are designed to appeal particularly to children, and their content had to be suitable for families. This approach ensures that the company's values are transmitted to society, positioning the hall as an alternative to other shows that promoted moral corruption.

There is also a notable coincidence with the Mercè hall in the authors of the musical visions that were premiered: Joaquim Pecanins —a friend of Masó who even came to Girona for the premiere of his piece[624]—, had recently composed the musical vision La dona d'aigua, commissioned by the Mercè hall. Adrià Esquerrà was one of the most prolific composers of both the Mercè hall and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Ros i Güell was also one of the usual set designers of the musical visions produced by Lluís Graner.

[624] La lucha 8823 (26/04/1906), p. 2.

The piece that inaugurated the activity of the Geryon hall was L'oració de la nit [The night prayer], subtitled as a "crepuscular vision" that was premiered on April 28th, 1906. The lyrics were written by Rafael Masó, who also was the artistic director of the season, and the music was written by Joaquim Pecanins. The play was inspired by the German tale of Hansel and Gretel, in a revised Catholic version. It consists of a single scene in which two little sisters are lost in the woods when the sun starts to set. Before night arrives, they say her daily night prayer that would bring them protection. A group of little demons finds them in the meantime, but an angel appears as an answer to their prayer to scare the demons away, because "God listens to the prayers of such immaculate hearts".

The stage set depicted a thick forest by the time of the sunset, which probably used electric light effects to recreate the setting of the sun as characteristic of other musical visions like La matinada [The sunrise] or Flors de muntanya [Mountain flowers]. The backcloth was painted by renowned artist Antoni Ros i Güell, a very active collaborator of the Mercè hall. Around a total of 15 children made up the cast of the piece: two girls, one angel, and a troupe of little demons. The musical instrumental overture of the piece is used to create a gloomy and distressing feeling, which is played while the girls pronounce their short dialogue explaining their situation and kneel to pray. The predominant motif repeated throughout the piece is a birds call in two notes, imitating the sound of a cuckoo bird:

The cuckoo motif played by the right hand on the piano is repeated in different beats inside each measure, showing an irregular pattern. Nevertheless, it's always played on the weak part of the beat, which reinforces the internal rhythmic irregularity. In the melody played by the strings, the note from the weak beat is often prolonged to reach the strong beat, as if the tempo was being dragged. Sometimes the melodic theme starts on the first beat of the measure, in some others, on the second, diluting the rhythmic regularity. Another motif that appears on repeated occasions is a crossed glissando on the chords. While the violin plays a descending glissando, the cello plays an ascending one to descend afterwards, reinforcing the sensation of distress:

The entrance of the little demons is accompanied by very fast ascending scales and arpeggios on the piano, a shock contrasting with the previous slow tempo. These are very rhythmic and clearly mark the regularity of the beats. Once the demons are on stage, they sing a chorus with a melody that resembles a folk song, if it was not an actual quote of one of them, given that the press said about this number that the demons were singing "a popular song". This section maintains a very rhythmic character, with the cello and the left hand of the piano marking the beats, and the violin and right hand off time. A gestural choreography inspired by Dalcroze's pedagogical method was performed here by the little demons.

In contrast, the number that follows shows a very slow tempo, with a pianissimo melody sung by the angel and multiple-octaves wide ascending arpeggios in the piano imitating the sonority of a heavenly harp. The nature of both characters is portrayed by music, with a disruptive, fast and rhythmic entrance of the demons, resolved by a slow peaceful melody sung by the angel, played along embracing ascending arpeggios.

Therefore, this musical vision, as characteristic of the genre, is presenting a short-format scene in which folk elements are present (as an inspiration for the plot and in the form of a folk-sounding chorus), as well as religious ones (the prayer and the angel), including a moral teaching for kids about God's protection if you pray every night before going to sleep.

During the short spring season of the Geryon hall, a second musical vision was premiered. Muntanyes de Canigó [Canigó mountains] was premiered on June 21st, 1906. The text was written by Nicolau de la Font and the music was arranged by Adrià Esquerrà, a well-known collaborator of Lluís Graner in Barcelona. The piece was subtitled as a "Pyrenean vision" and it included a harmonized gloss of the folk song known by the same name. The stage set, made again by Ros i Güell, presented a landscape view of the Canigó mountains, a key geographical spot for Catalan mythology that historically belonged to the Crown of Aragon, now located in the French Pyrinees. Years later, the lyric tragedy Canigó, written by Josep Carner and Jaume Pahissa in 1910, treated the same topic and included quotes from the same folk song.

Along with the musical visions and the film screenings that completed the sessions, also some afternoons were dedicated especially to children with folk tales' narrations. Different tales compilated by priest Alcover in Mallorca were told to children, including the titles La rateta [The little rat], L'hermosura del món [The beauty of the world] and En Pere Grill [Peter Grill]. The musical ensemble Trio Mollera i Dalmau also dedicated some sessions to musical performances of folk dances typical of the local festivities. The season concluded on July 1st.

For its second season on 1906/07, the Geryon hall aimed to continue with the same style of programming that it had held during the previous season, but instead it had to gradually reduce its activity. The company's main goal was to hold regular film screenings on Sundays throughout the whole season, which would only be suspended for solemn religious celebrations. Actually, the hall had needed during its inaugural renovation a whole new wiring system that came straight from the electric generator of the city, due to the technical requirements of the projector that needed a powerful and stable flow of electricity[625]. The film sessions were usually one hour long and took place between 4:00 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. The Saint Narcís festivities and the Christmas holidays were the only events that extended the Sunday film sessions to other days of the week, but only temporarily.

The theatrical activity of the Geryon company would be reduced, premiering only one new musical vision with a unique function. Les quatre barres [The four bars], by Josep de Palol with music by Francesc d'Assís Font was premiered on September 29th, subtitled as "graphic visions" or "musical ballad" in two scenes that staged the legend of the Catalan flag made of four red bars[626]. The storytelling sessions dedicated to children would not be repeated either. However, some extraordinary sessions were also programmed to reprise the musical visions from the previous season. During the month of January and, later on, between the end of June and the middle of July, the "sessions de moda" or trend sessions took place. They were usually scheduled as the last session of the day, starting at 9:00 or 9:30 p.m. on Sundays, and included select film screenings and the reprise of Muntanyes de Canigó and L'oració de la nit. The season finished on the last weekend of July.

The rest of theatrical activities in the hall would be programmed directly by the Moral Center's dramatic troupe, technically independent of the Geryon company, although sharing lots of their members. They staged pieces such as the zarzuelas Cápsulas Mausser, Catalunya!, Lo sant de l'amo, Lo que pasa en Madrid and Lo allotjat; the dramas El fill del crehuat and Els mals companys; or the comedies Lo darrer acreedor and Vells i boigs. Additionally, the theatrical activity in the Catholic Circle of Workers, the musical activity of the Orfeó Gironí that occasionally included the performance of Catalan zarzuelas[627], and the opening of the new Sports cinematographer would increase competition in the city's cultural sector.

It is also worth noting the gradual separation of the Mollera musical ensemble from the Geryon hall, which had until then been their artistic residence. At the beginning of the season, during the Saint Narcís festivities, the Mollera trio performed as usual in theatrical productions organized by the Moral Center. However, throughout the season, as they transition to becoming professors of the Schola Orpheònica[628] and embark on new musical projects, they will be present in the Geryon hall less frequently. During the second half of the season, they only performed at the Geryon hall as part of the Schola Orpheònica concerts given there and in the premiere on February 2nd of a new zarzuela in three acts with Isidre Mollera's music titled El cazador negro, played by a sextet that Mollera directed himself [629].

During the 1907/08 season, only film screenings were scheduled, taking place on Sundays and on other public holidays. They used to begin at 4:00 p.m by the start of the season, but their scheduling was progressively delayed and by the end of the season they were beginning at 5:00 p.m.

A Pathé gramophone was introduced for the reproduction of music records to add interest to the sessions[630], given that the Mollera trio would not perform there again from this season on. It appears that Isidre Mollera had definitively detached from the hall, as he was currently engaged in other personal projects. The only musical activity that has been documented in the hall during this third season is the concert for the festival of Saint Carles, which was organized by the Traditionalist Youth association[631].

Meanwhile, the Principal theater has been hosting a series of concerts, attracting groups that were previously regulars at the Geryon hall, including the Orfeó Catalunya and the Schola Orpheònica. Furthermore, there has been an increase in the public offer of concerts, with frequent outdoor performances by the Regimiento de Infantería de Asia.

Unlike the previous season, the amateur troupe of the Moral Centre does not organize any performance whatsoever. However, there is a significant increase in theatrical activity documented in other associations, including the dramatic section of the Orfeó Gironí and an opera season at the Principal theater.

With regard to cinematic programming, it is important to note that El Paralelo hall enters this arena as another new competitor. On certain occasions, the two halls have even scheduled screenings of the same films simultaneously. As religious newspapers have observed, the films in question have undergone a transformation, deviating from their original devout essence. The titles that were announced indicate that the film repertoire consisted of comedies, anecdotal humor, and documentary films about foreign countries.

In consideration of the aforementioned circumstances, this third season can be regarded as the ultimate decline of the company's theatrical endeavors. Among the factors contributing to its brief lifespan are the following: the young age of the management team, the reliance on a larger entity (the Moral Centre) that owned and shared the venue, the shortage of professional performers capable of sustaining a full season, and the increasing professional competition of other venues offering a similar cultural program.

The summer period of 1908 appears to have been uninterrupted, with film screenings taking place on Sundays extending into July and August. Once the 1908/09 season starts, the Geryon hall keeps on loosing relevance against the zarzuela season of the Principal theater and other cinematographic halls. There is a noticeable decline in media attention, as evidenced by a gradual decline in advertisements and the prolonged absence of announcements of movie titles being screened. As a marketing strategy, color films were introduced in the repertoire in the midpoint of the season, as well as historical dramas divided into multiple films.

In May 1909, the entity responsible for scheduling the cinematographic sessions in the Geryon hall was officially dissolved[632]. Consequently, the hall was placed under the direct administration of the Moral Centre, which repurposed it as an auditorium to host diverse events. For example, at the beginning of the 1909/1910 season, during the fair season, the Moral Center lend the venue to a newly constituted board of ladies who would place a raffle stand there[633]. The term "Saló Gerió" continued to be used for the hall well beyond the dissolution of the original company that opened it up, extending until approximately 1912.

Although the network's hall in Girona premiered very few original musical visions, it is worth highlighting the later life they had outside of the city.

Their original Muntanyes de Canigó, which had been premiered in June 1906, was later on reprised at the Ars-Lucis hall in February 1907. This fact emphasizes that even though the initial project came from Barcelona, the rest of companies producing musical visions also had contact between them and showed their own initiative to write, produce and itinerate their pieces, allowing their works to circulate independently of the capital. In this case, Joan Llongueras —the main composer of musical visions in Terrassa— had a close friendship with Rafael and Narcís Masó, which could explain this collaboration. It even probably motivated Llongueras to join Joaquim Vancells to open the musical visions hall in their city.

However, the most remarkable case would be that of L'oració de la nit. During the 1910s, Dalcroze pedagogical method based on songs with gestures, and exercises such as gymnastics and calisthenics for children were greatly promoted in Catalonia. One of the leading advocates of these pedagogies, who studied them firsthand in Germany, was Joan Llongueras, the aforementioned key promoter of the Ars-Lucis hall and close friend of Rafael Masó, who even visited him in Germany during his studies[634].

[634] FALGÀS, Jordi (ed.) (2013): Athenea 1913. El temple del Noucentisme. Girona: Fundació Rafael Masó / Úrsula Llibres, pp. 65–71.

In Girona, it was Rafael's brother —Narcís Masó— who led the promotion of these pedagogies as the director of the Patronato Obrero de Girona's rhythmic gymnastics school. L'oració de la nit was included in the repertoire of Dalcroze children's songs with gestures translated into Catalan as part of Narcís's project to import modern European pedagogical methods[635]. Beyond the school run by Narcís, other primary schools, both municipal and religious, chose this piece to be performed by children at special events and end-of-year performances.

For example, the municipality of Olot shows an especially keen reception of this piece. The Catholic Centre of Olot staged L'oració de la nit twice in 1908 and again in 1917, as well as the local parrish of Olot in 1926. The Orfeó Popular Olotí also performed it twice also in 1926 and once again in 1928. Considering the difficulty of documenting these amateur local performances, the identification of 7 stagings of this title shows its great reception among children's repertoire, as well as its outstanding long-lasting presence.

To briefly mention other cases, L'oració de la nit was also performed at the Catholic Academy of Ripoll in 1908 and 1909, in Palafrugell by Narcis Masó's gymnastics school in 1912, in the local school of Argelaguer in 1917, and in religious schools of Darnius and Mataró in 1923 and 1929.

It's worth noting especially the case of Adela Trayter i Colls, the director of the local school in La Bisbal de l'Empordà, who also personally promoted the Dalcroze method and used L'oració de la nit as one of the pieces to be learnt by the kids. She was also one of the early introductors of Montessori's pedagogical method in Catalonia and she collaborated with Joan Llongueras's Catalan Music Institute to organize school performances. She staged this musical vision with students from her school in 1912 and 1913, and the news even arrived to Rafael Masó himself[636].

Following the dissolution of the Geryon project, Rafael Masó initiated a series of new cultural initiatives. The construction of the Athenea hall was initiated in 1912, and it was formally inaugurated in 1913. The facility remained active until 1917. This venue could be considered as a continuation of the cultural project that Masó initiated with the Geryon hall, but in a more mature point of his career, as well as fully owned by him, independent from external entities, such as the case of the Moral Center being the owner of the building in which the Geryon hall operated. Although Masó's initial intention for the project also included theatrical performances, the Athenea hall did not finally present any stage programming and was dedicated to musical concerts, presentations and public readings of books, and conferences[637].

Among other members, the intellectuals who were originally involved in the musical visions in Barcelona, such as Josep Carner or Adrià Gual, attended the Athenea hall as speakers, and the musicians of the Geryon hall, Josep M.ª Dalmau and Tomàs Mollera, also gave concerts in the new venue. In fact, the aforementioned musicians would form the Catalan Quintet, which came back to perform in the Moral Center again, as well as in the Athenea hall. The quintet was dedicated to the dissemination of the historical classic repertoire, a similar intention as the concert seasons organized at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Therefore, although it left behind the genre of musical visions, the Athenea project meant a “Noucentista” or Neoclassical continuation of the embryo that began in the Geryon hall. The repetition on Athenea’s playbills of the name of many of the personalities initially linked to the movement of the musical visions is proof of it.

❖ Ars-Lucis (Terrassa)

By the inauguration of the Ars-Lucis, the city of Terrassa had already hosted modernist cultural initiatives, involving some of its future protagonists. For example, since 1899, the painter Joaquim Vancells, future director of the musical visions venue, had been organizing small concert meetings in his house where his artist friends and his family sang pieces by Wagner, Bach, and Catalan folk songs. Among the attendees was Enric Granados, who also instructed Vancells's daughter in music. In 1909, Granados gave his first public concert in Terrassa, inaugurating the art evenings of the Agrupació Regionalista, a Catalanist civil association[638].

Vancells's musical enthusiasm prompted him to bring the Catalanist choral groups to the city. He extended an invitation to the Orfeó Català, an organization that had recently been established in Barcelona under the direction of Lluís Millet and Amadeu Vives, to perform in Terrassa. The primary objective of the Orfeó Català was the promotion of Catalan music through the choral harmonization of traditional songs.

In 1896, the commission organized by Galí, Arch, Soler i Palet, and Utset Juncosa arranged the first visit of the Orfeó Català in Terrassa. The expenses were to be covered by a popular subscription, and the visit finally took place on August 23th, 1896, at the Principal theater. As the hand program for the concert stated:

> "The Orfeó Català of Barcelona, that his master Lluís Millet conducts, agreed on celebrating a series of popular concerts in the main Catalan cities, in order to disseminate good music from our land, singing our tender and beautiful folk songs, as well as some foreign ones of the same kind, and some other pieces by Catalan and foreign composer.
> Its meritorious and disinterested task, achieved already in Sabadell and Masnou, has been praised and applauded with enthusiasm by the public and the newspapers, being a true musical event in those municipalities. What we try today is nothing further than enjoying also the praise and applause of the important city of Terrassa. To achieve so, a concert will be given at the Principal theater of this city at 4 in the afternoon of next Sunday, August 23rd [639]."

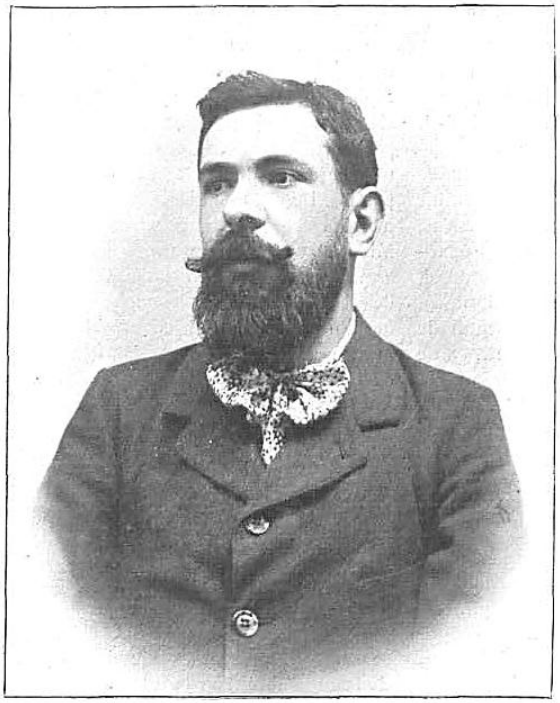
On November 6th, 1898, the Orfeó Català returned to the Principal theater and the Retiro theater, along with a large popular celebration held in its honor, which included a reception at the train station and a banquet[640].



On July 2nd, 1899, the choir Catalunya Nova, directed by Enric Morera, also visited Terrassa to celebrate the major festive day of the city. Most of its repertoire consisted of Morera's harmonizations of folk songs, which would subsequently become an integral part of the repertoire of the nascent local choral associations of Terrassa. The Catalunya Nova choir arrived accompanied by Santiago Rusiñol and Jaume Pahissa, two prominent figures of Modernism also associated with the Catalan lyrical theater movement[641].

The foundation of the choir section of the Agrupació Regionalista in 1900 coincided with another visit of the Orfeó Català to Terrassa, an event that would not be repeated until 1915. The new choir was under the direction of Joaquim's brother, Francesc Vancells, who was later on succeeded by Martí Alegre, a musician and writer who authored dramatic pieces and lyrics for zarzuela[642]. Alegre would collaborate shortly after with the Ars-Lucis hall. In addition, he engaged in a collaboration with the Teatre Íntim company led by Adrià Gual, playing a role at their staging of the Greek tragedy Prometeu encadenat [Prometheus bound]. Moreover, he helped in the compilation of rural Catalan folk songs.

Joan Llongueras was subsequently appointed as the next conductor of the choir of the Agrupació Regionalista, a position for which he was direct suggested by the renowned Catalanist political leader Prat de la Riba[643]. The institution ultimately became known as the Escola Coral, which, under the direction of Llongueras, introduced a season of "select sessions of art" in Terrassa, attracting prominent musical ensembles to the city.

Joaquim Vancells used to travel to Barcelona with the purpose of attending choral concerts, where he became acquainted with Enric Morera. He was also in close touch with Joan Llongueras, to whom he made requests for songs and copies of scores when the need arose. In his correspondence, Vancells informs Llongueras, following his attendance to a "Wagnerian-style choir" concert in Barcelona, of his enthusiasm for the musical contribution that they were making for the Catalan people. He continued stating that it was imperative for the youth of Barcelona to be acquainted with the artistic value of choral music. "May art and the motherland repay you", Vancells said to Llongueras in February, 1906[644]. At the end of the year, Vancells would inaugurate the Ars-Lucis hall, with the customary collaboration of Llongueras as commissioned composer.

The Ars-Lucis hall represented the ambitions of Joaquim Vancells to go beyond painting and explore the field of stage design using the recent electric technology for the stage lighting, creating a show that unites live plastic art with music, following in the footsteps of his renowned colleague Lluís Graner at the Mercè hall[645]. In fact, the name "Ars-Lucis" literally translates from Latin as "the art of the light". Vancells was also, as well as Graner, Masó or Gaudí, member of the Saint Lluc Artists' Circle, which is believed to be the place where all the main promoters of musical visions networked.

The hall was located on the first floor of the Gran Café Condal building, at the square of the Font Trobada, in the center of Terrassa. The venue was linked to the Agrupació Regionalista in terms of funding as well as musical and theatrical collaboration, since the performers and singers were drawn from the dramatic troupe and the choral school of this association. Vancells, as impresario and artistic director of the hall, received financial assistance from Joan Bosch, physician and director of the Agrupació Regionalista[646]. The hall was inaugurated on October 13th, 1906, but there is evidence suggesting that Bosch began to contribute financially as early as 1904.

The musical visions premiered in Terrassa aligned aesthetically with those produced in Barcelona. The repertoire also incorporated "visions of nature" recreating rural and pastoral environments, Christmas themes, and arrangements of folk songs. It is noteworthy, however, to mention the importation of certain pieces from the repertoire of the Mercè and the Gerió halls.

Muntanyes de Canigó [The Canigó mountains], coming from the Gerió hall, was reprised in Terrassa on February 3rd, 1907. The piece glosses a folk song about the mythological Canigó mountains in Catalonia, arranged by Adrià Esquerrà, and it was presented with a new set designed by Vancells. Somni de Jacob [Jacob's dream], coming from the Mercè hall, had been written by Mateu Nonell upon the biblical character of Jacob, with music arranged also by Adrià Esquerrà. The piece was reprised on March 3rd, 1907, with a new set designed by Vancells and the Viver brothers, renowned landscape painters from Terrassa[647].

Joan Llongueras, who was deeply involved in the artistic team of the Ars-Lucis, was a close friend of Josep Carner, who worked at the Mercè hall and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner for the first two seasons. When Llongueras was commissioned to write music for the Principal theater of Barcelona, like the incidental music for El malalt imaginari [The imaginary invalid] by Molière or the musical vision L'any mil [The year one thousand], with text by the same Carner, it was his friend Josep Carner who signed the official letters[648].

Llongueras was also a close friend of Rafael Masó, the artistic director of the Saló Gerió in Girona. When Llongueras was in Germany studying the Dalcroze pedagogies, Rafael even visited him while touring Germany as his wedding trip. Later on, their collaboration continued and Llongueras organized at Masó's Athenea society activities introducing the rhythmic gymnastics for children that he was dedicated to promote as a pedagogue[649]. His activity probably influenced directly the role of Rafael's younger brother, who also became a pedagogue promoting the use of the Dalcroze pedagogies, including the musical vision L'oració de la nit in his children repertoire.

Therefore, the collaborations between halls were not only professional regarding the facilitation of productions from one to another, but also personal and intellectual.

As for the original productions staged at the Ars-Lucis hall, the first of them, which inaugurated the activity of the venue, was Flors de muntanya. The piece was subtitled as a "vision of nature", following the precedent of La matinada from the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Written by Joaquim Vancells, who also designed the stage set, the piece presents a scene in nature where a little boy and a girl hold different conversations. The stage presents a view of the neighboring mountain of La Mata, covered in fog, and the cliffs of Montcau[650].

In the first scene, the sun is rising and the first morning sounds of nature can be heard. The sound of the leaves, a rooster, a dog and the sheep are heard. The leaves from the trees start looking greener when the light starts shining on them. The two children play together and mock each other for being lazy and not paying much attention to the bulls. While leaving the scene to look for the animals, they sing the folk song A la torre xica, a la torre gran and the boy plays a cheerful dance with a folk flute.

The second scene takes place in the afternoon. The trees are projecting shadows under which the little girl is napping. The heat and boredom of the after-lunch time should be felt in the ambience of the scene. The beginning of the scene is connected to the previous one by the singing of the same folk song. Both children play together again and collect pinecones to eat their nuts, when a storm begins. The sky becomes dark, and thunder and lightning announce the coming storm. The scared bulls can be heard while it rains.

In the third scene, the evening is coming to an end, and the lights of the town houses can be seen far away. The ambience is very still when the boy arrives. One of his bulls fell on the cliff and he will be punished by the owner that hired him as a shepherd. She can't make him feel any comfort and gives him her medallion with a religious image to bring him luck. All of a sudden, the bells from the town's church play an Angelus and the boys choir sing a prayer. Decided to leave the town, while the music is playing, the boy looks up to the sky and starts walking into the darkness holding the medallion.

This vision presents, therefore, the folk, religious and nature elements characteristic of the genre. The piece is an ode to nature and its interest is based on the plastic exploration of lighting on the backdrop, accompanied by sound and other special effects. Different ambiences are recreated, from the sunrise and awakening of animals, to a hot afternoon, a heavy storm, and the evening sunset. Folk music is playing along the portrayal of popular traditions, such as the pinecone picking, and rural professions like the shepherd are also shown. Little action takes place on stage, while the scenes are focused on evocating different states of emotion, and religion if finally portrayed as the place where comfort can be found to redeem one's mistakes.

The following premiere was Pastor-Rei [Shepherd-King], of which no details about the plot are known. The music was written by Joan Llongueras, a close collaborator of Vancells in the Ars-Lucis project, and the stage design was done by Vancells and the Viver brothers. By the title, we can suspect a bucolic topic including, again, shepherding in nature. In February, in the occasion of the carnival, a parody of Pastor-Rei was premieres at the Ars-Lucis titles Camàlic, rei de la broma [Stable lad, king of jokes], a "sketch of carnival current affairs" in two acts. It was written by Joan Carné and included Italian-styled musical numbers, a triumphant march, and a final chorus sang by the whole company composed by Marc Armengol. In some press reviews, the title was initially announced before the premiere as Rei Camàlic, for which we can suppose that the stable lad becomes a king.

The next production authored by Joaquim Vancells was La lluerna [The firefly], for which he again designed the stage set himself. The first scene shows the sunny beach of Can Sans, by the fishermen neighborhood of Llavaneres. Fishermen populate the stage, dunes of sand are on stage, as well as rocks and water made with different fabrics. The dialogue of the characters imitated the local accent and slang of the fishermen.

On the second scene, the sea is portrayed with waves while the sky gets darker. The scene starts with a slow and gloomy prelude followed by a fishermen chorus that's heard from far away, sounding like a lament about the inevitability of work and who, one or another, has the duty to take out the web from the sea, thanking God that it's full of fish.

On the beach on stage, a fisherman appears and a little girl climbs down from the rocks while the moon is shining. With a single kiss, she achieves to turn him into a caring man, leaving behind his grumpiness and selfishness, taking him in his arms as if she was his daughter. The piece ends with a song in which a female soloist sings about the latest news at the Can Sans beach, about a woman called Lluerna, who has passed away, leaving her daughter in the care of a man called Rasclot. Her parts are intercalated with reprises of the fishermen choir about how bitter the sea is.

The point of the piece is probably to contrast the hard life of fishermen in contrast with the sweetness of the girl, and how innocent love can move even the most bitter heart. Again, the plastic experimentation is very present on Vancells's design, creating a beach on stage and using different lighting on the marine backdrop, creating different atmospheres on the same beach by changing the use of the light and the music accompaniment. The vision does not develop dramatic action, and the information needed to understand the role of the characters is given at the end in the lyrics of the final song.

By the end of December 1906, the "Christmas scenes of countrified rusticity" titled Camí de Betlem [Path to Bethlehem] were premiered. The piece was made up of two scenes and the authors are not known. However, the press reviews indicate that the lyric were taken from the folk song Lo rabadà, Christmas themed, that had already been used in other musical visions written for the Mercè hall in Barcelona. The backdrops would portray the Pyrenees with mountainous landscapes, and the reviews especially praise the variations that the lighting creates on them. The characters would have been based on folk stereotypes of the mountain people from the region. Following what the folk song narrates, the scenes of the play would have presented mountain shepherds holding torches and walking on the snowy mountain starting their way to Bethlehem since it's Christmas Day and Jesus is going to be born.

The last original musical vision of the season was Ofèlia, premiered on March 31st, 1907, which takes its title from the character of Shakespeare's Hamlet. The piece would have been based on scenes taken from the original story of Hamlet, glossing the parts in which Ofelia takes part to idealize this character. The first scene was located in a tavern, including a chorus of drinkers, with a realistic aesthetic. The second one produces a contrast by taking us to a fantastic scene, in which there's a musical solo by Ofelia and a chorus of fairies. The text was arranged by Martí Alegre and the music was written by Adrià Esquerrà for a violin, viola, piano and harmonium quartet. The stage set was made by the Viver brothers.

The programmed sessions were complemented by film screenings, including also the "spoken cinema" genre, which was pioneered by Lluís Graner in the Mercè hall. As previously explained, this approach involved actors speaking live while hidden in the pit of the stage, as a voiceover while the movies were being projected. However, later testimonies suggest that Vancells may have cut numerous scenes that he judged, in accordance with his moral principles, to be inappropriate for public dissemination, ultimately leading to the cessation of the distribution of tapes by the producers[651].

According to certain press reviews, a select but very scarce audience attended the venue. For the working classes, the musical visions, which featured minimal narrative plots and prioritized artistic contemplation, were likely perceived as elitist. Some neighbors even boycotted some of the performances yelling from their seat words to mock the religious connotations of some pieces, which led the anticlerical opinions rage against the Ars-Lucis productions[652]. However, the programming also included several concerts and theatrical performances of dramas and sainets.

The Associació Musical organized at the Ars-Lucis concerts by the Russian violinist Winssant Rhodresski, the local baritone Marc Barba, and the Catalan pianist Esperança Forés. The Escola Coral directed by Joan Llongueras at that time also performed at the Ars-Lucis hall on March 21st, 1907. Also, some dramatic pieces without music were staged, like Sirena by Apel·les Mestres, La festa dels ocells by Ignasi Iglésias (with a stage set designed by Vancells), or La mare by Santiago Rusiñol (with a stage set designed by the Viver brothers).

The remaining theaters in Terrassa, namely the Principal and the Retiro theaters, presented ongoing artistic performances throughout the season, including operas, zarzuelas, literary evenings, concerts, and dance performances. It is noteworthy that concurrently with the inauguration of the Ars-Lucis, a Spanish zarzuela company was established in the Principal theater, presenting several canonical titles from the Spanish repertoire. The dramatic section of the Agrupació Regionalista and the new Ars-Lucis hall would have worked as the scenic and lyrical alternative in Catalan language.

The activity of the season that had started in October ended in mid-May. On the one hand, a cinematographic hall in the Alegria theater was inaugurated on those dates, increasing the local competition. On the other, the Corpus Christi festivities were to take place at the end of May. Therefore, the hall decided to end its season before overlapping the festive and summer seasons. The Associació Musical on its own had also gained a lot of prominence by then and began to organize several concerts and conferences on music and lyric drama.

From June through July, some extraordinary concerts and theatrical performances were organized at the Ars-Lucis and the company would cease its activity, at least temporarily.

[652] PI DE LA SERRA, Paulina (1978): L'ambient cultural a Terrassa 1877-1977, op. cit., pp. 149–151.

This does not imply, however, that there was no cultural activity in Terrassa during the summer that involved the artistic team of the Ars-Lucis.

In July 1907, the Agrupació Regionalista organized an independent exhibition of local art, which was held from June 29th to July 7th. Joaquim Vancells was directly involved in the exhibition's organization. This event coincided with the inauguration of the association's new premises, an event that was celebrated with a ceremony that included the reading of a series of letters by Adrià Gual and poems by Manuel de Montoliu. Among the attendees, the presence of Ramon Casas at some of the events was especially remarkable. Hence, the most renowned personalities of Catalanist Modernist culture converged in Terrassa on these dates.

The artistic exhibition was hosted in the open air, situated at the gardens of the new premises of the Agrupació Regionalista, where a café and a service offering soft drinks had been installed. As part of the activities, the performance of El jardí abandonat [The abandoned garden] was scheduled. This lyric drama, written by Santiago Rusiñol with music by Joan Gay, had been written for the first Catalan Lyric Theater season organized by Enric Morera at the Tívoli theater and had remained eventually not premiered. The stage direction for this production was to be meticulously orchestrated by Santiago Rusiñol himself. Joan Llongueras recruited students at his choral school to perform as vocalists for the piece. The performance was planned to take place in the aforementioned gardens, as an imitation of the French "theater of nature" performances, and the set decoration was prepared for the premiere[653].

Nevertheless, its execution was postponed until the end of August to accommodate Rusiñol's presence[654] and the local art exhibition was eventually closured without premiering the piece. On Sunday, the 11th, the exhibition concluded with a raffle gifting postcards. From Thursday, August 15th on, the artists were permitted to retrieve their art pieces for disassembly. No evidence has been found that the performance of El jardí abandonat was reprised anytime afterwards in Terrassa, nor the will of the author to actually stage it has been documented, since Rusiñol had already claimed in the past that the decadent symbolism exposed in El jardí abandonat was too unattractive for a commercial production and that he didn't like much the music that Joan Gay wrote for it.

The Ars-Lucis hall, which appeared to have closed its doors following the conclusion of its inaugural season by the summer of 1907, reopened for a brief winter season. Despite the initial announcement in early November regarding the relaunch of the hall's activity, the resumption was postponed until the end of December. According to the religious spirit and the practicing Catholicism that characterized the companies of musical visions, the Ars-Lucis reopened in late December 1907 to represent two musical visions based on religious Christmas themes.

Although Lo mal rabadà was initially announced, it was ultimately replaced by Jesús és nat [Jesus is born], which was performed on Christmas Day. Both titles had been premiered at the Mercè hall in Barcelona. Jesús és nat, written by Rafael Nogueras Oller, with music by Joaquim Grant glossing the Christmas folk song Lo noi de la mare, was reprised in Terrassa on December 25th, 1907.

Subsequently, on New Year's Eve, a revised version of Jesús és nat and Camí de Betlem was presented under the title Nit de Nadal [Christmas Eve], a "musical vision in 4 scenes". Apparently, it would have been just an arrangement of the two previously premiered pieces put together, since no further notice of the authorship is given.

On the occasion of the Three Wise Men Day in January 1908, the musical vision for children entitled Un zing-zing, un te té, una R i una E was reprised in Terrassa. The piece, written also by Rafael Nogueras Oller and with music by Frederic Alfonso, had been premiered at the Mercè hall the previous year. It was subtitled as a "Three Kings tale", aligning with the thematic framework of the festivity on which it was performed. Although no documents have been localized, we know from the press reviews that it was divided into two scenes and that it included the performance of a little girl, her mother and the Three Wise Men. It had reportedly been performed at the Mercè hall successfully over 180 times[655].

In fact, all the aforementioned titles that were staged for the Christmas season at the Ars-Lucis hall were part of the original repertoire of the Mercè hall, which ceased performances at the onset of November 1907 due to a municipal prohibition imposed on the cinemas, not allowing them to arrange live performances. Consequently, the reopening of the Ars-Lucis facilities during the winter season was likely a strategic initiative to ensure the continuity of the network's operations, with the support from the hall in Barcelona.

Joaquim Vancells had already programmed some pieces from the Mercè hall during the previous season, and the Ars-Lucis project itself was inspired by this venue. The friendship and professional connections he shared with Lluís Graner would have potentially enabled a business collaboration to host his productions[656], particularly given that the Ars-Lucis hall was equipped with the necessary lighting equipment and technical crew to stage musical visions and screen the films that would complement the sessions, as was the case at the Mercè hall.

Following the Three Kings Day, the Ars-Lucis hall remained active until late February, offering exclusively cinematographic programs. In mid-February, the hall worked as a meeting venue for students of the Industrial Schools, as an external activity. The last announcement regarding the cinematographic sessions at the Ars Lucis was issued on Saturday, the 22nd. Consequently, this weekend could have marked the culmination of the activities at the Ars-Lucis.

The presence of a painting by Vancells among the gifts given to the public at a raffle celebrated during this period would indicate that the painter had still been linked to the project. However, it could have been a mere itineracy of the Barcelona company after the closure of their residency at the capital. Following this brief winter season in Terrassa, the company from Barcelona took their musical vision from the Mercè hall on official itineracies to Manresa, Reus and Vilafranca, among other locations.

Regardless of its relative success, the project accumulated substantial economic debts, which would have led to the termination of the hall's operations. Vancells would continue to deal with these financial issues for years[657], such as the case of his associate Lluís Graner, the pioneering figure of Barcelona's musical visions. Nevertheless, it is noteworthy to mention the premature passing of Vancells's daughter, who was buried on January 4th, 1908, being still a little child. This personal experience undoubtedly influenced the painter's decision not to continue with the programming of any children's musical vision at the Ars-Lucis after the one already scheduled for the Three Kings Day.

Quoting the words of La sembra, Terrassa ended up being "condemned to prose" when the Ars-Lucis closed, alluding to the metaphor from the lyric drama L'alegria que passa by Rusiñol and Morera, in which modernist artists were rejected when trying to bring the "poetry" into the provincial towns. However, the termination of the Ars-Lucis project did not result in the total inactivity of the members involved.

Joan Llongueras merits particular recognition for his sustained commitment to musical development of Terrassa through the Choir School. The objective of musical visions, which was to continue the transmission of oral folklore in urban environments, found its continuation through the concerts that the school gave, including several folk songs in their repertoire. The harmonizations arranged by Enric Morera were of notable popularity, along with a conjunction of gestures, choreographies, and gymnastic exercises grounded in the Dalcroze's pedagogy. Llongueras even translated himself a substantial part of the original Dalcroze repertoire from German[658].

The relationship with Adrià Gual, the ideologue and first stage director of musical visions in Barcelona, endured over time, evidenced by Gual's frequent lectures on Dalcroze pedagogy together with Llongueras. It is noteworthy that during the same period in which the Ars-Lucis reopened for the winter season of 1907/08, Gual's Teatre Íntim company was presenting translations of foreign theater classics in Terrassa.

Figure 214: Program of the select artistic session given on March 25th, 1911, dedicated to children's lyric theater by Llongueras's Choral School. [BC: M 5800/22].

The collaboration between Vancells and Llongueras also persisted, as the painter designed multiple sets for the stages where the Choir School performed its concerts. It is significant to note that on March 25th, 1911, the Lent concert season of the Choral School featured a session dedicated to children's lyric theater, in which Flors de muntanya, the musical vision premiered at the Ars-Lucis, was performed again. This production featured new sets and costumes designed by Joaquim Vancells and Pere Viver. According to the program:

> "This vision of nature, truly exquisite, was premiered and performed many times with great success, about four or five years ago, at the Ars-Lucis hall. The first sparks of a pure and sincere love in simple and innocent souls who live in the middle of nature is the theme developed with surprising discretion and good taste.
> It's made of three delicious moments, torn from real life, in which even nature seems to admirably describe the different states of the two twin souls who awaken themselves to the highest and noblest emotions of living.[659]"

This performance was part of the series of "Select Artistic Sessions", which had been organized since 1906 by Joan Llongueras through the Choral School. These events, which were meticulously programmed during the Lenten season for at least ten consecutive years, were designed with the pedagogical objective of introducing the most distinguished musical performers to Terrassa, while also presenting the classical musical repertoire in the city. This pedagogical intention and the repertoire played were analogous to those of the concert seasons of the Espectacles-Audiciones Graner.

[658] The personal archive of Joan Llongueras stored at the Catalan Library [Biblioteca de Catalunya] includes multiple hand programs of these events describing all the pieces that were played.

Some of the notable composers featured were Scarlatti, Beethoven, Liszt, Schumann, Bach, and Haydn, accompanied by concise biographies in the hand programs. Ensembles such as the Orfeó Català, the Renaissance Quartet (with Eduard Toldrà), the orchestra of the Associació Musical de Barcelona (conducted by Lamote de Grignon) or the pianist Enric Granados played at these select sessions in Terrassa.

A parallel can be drawn between this case and that of the Gerió hall in Girona, where Rafael Masó worked as the primary promoter. Following a brief period of operation, Masó presented his most notable musical vision, titled L'oració de la nit, which became prominent in the region as part of the children's repertoire, alternated with other songs, gestural choreographies, and gymnastic exercises. As well, Masó had the pedagogical objective of promoting the classical music repertoire, which he often programmed later at his Athenea hall.

Furthermore, the design of both halls and their programming was influenced by the same Mercè hall from Barcelona. It is worth noting again that the piece performed at the Ars-Lucis Muntanyes de Canigó was original from the Gerió hall, which indicates that both venues established a collaborative interaction.

Finally, it is also worth highlighting the moral cinematographic activity, which was continued on by the Catholic Youth association. In January of 1909, this organization inaugurated a cinematographic hall under the name "Sala Montserrat". The venue was actually designed by Joaquim Vancells and featured stained glass windows that pictured a view of the Montserrat mountains, set against a pine forest. The hall's design was intended to create an ambiance reminiscent of the mountains at twilight, with the pine forest of the window glasses serving as a backdrop. The screenings featured moral films suitable for family viewing, following the path started by the Ars-Lucis and the Mercè hall.

❖ Saló Artístic (Sabadell)

The "Saló Artístic" or Artistic hall was established as a private company specializing its cultural offer in cinematography and musical visions. It was inaugurated on the ground floor of the Catholics' Association of Sabadell (Rambla, 65), where the building had an auditory that functioned as their primary communal space. The organization's establishment occurred on October 26th, 1907, following the prohibition issued by Barcelona City Council that forbid the live performances at the Mercè hall in Barcelona. Under the motto "deleitar moralitzant" or "delight while moralizing", the Artistic hall shared with the Mercè venue the same pursuit of offering moral shows appropriate for family audiences.

The aforementioned hall, under the direction of Mr. Carreras and Mr. Pujol, reached an agreement with Lluís Graner to bring a selection of the productions from the Mercè hall to Sabadell, including the decorations and costumes. Remarkably, the cast of the Artistic hall featured Maria Vendrell, a notable child performer who had previously gained recognition as an actress in both the Mercè hall and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

The venue also hosted a resident musical quartet integrated by Mateu Rifà Planas (violin and conducting), F. Sendra (viola), A. Baqués (violoncello) and Joan Padró Badia (piano). Mateu Rifà, the conductor, had been a pupil of Enric Morera on the topics of harmony and composition and he studied violin with Domènech Sánchez, professor at the Conservatory of Barcelona. He wrote several choir and instrumental pieces that he used to perform especially at the Centre Català in Sabadell and eventually became a teacher at the municipal music school[660].

In the Artistic hall, the musical visions Mentides que no fan mal [Lies that do not hurt], La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta... [The Mother of God when she was little…] and El mal ric [The bad rich man] were performed after being brought from Barcelona.

Mentides que no fan mal is a comic piece by Josep Ribot with music by Batista i Cretona based on a moralizing lesson for children. A little girl, thinking that "people can't be poor", has been telling people that she comes from a wealthy family, considering that little lie "won't hurt". When his father realizes, he tells her off and threatens her with taking out the big cross because lying is a sin.

El mal ric is based on the homonymous folk song. A selfish rich man does not want to share any charity with a poor man that passes by. He turned out to be a pilgrim, which sings the folk song the piece is based on before dying of hunger and going to heaven, received by a choir of archangels. As for the rich man, he's condemned to hell, where he meets a choir of dancing demons, creating a great contrast visual, musical and dancing ambience between the hellish and the heavenly scenes.

For La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta..., the original stage set that had been so successful in Barcelona is brought to Sabadell for the reprise of the piece. It is also based on an homonymous folk song, presenting a scene in which Virgin Mary appears as a little girl going to school and learning how to write. Seven little girls appear on stage in front of a backdrop depicting a Gothic hall. The short vision is fully accompanied by music, based on the repetition of the folk melody in a crescendo of intensity and orchestral density until the peak is reached at the end during the final apotheosis, in which a vision of adult Virgin Mary appears on stage surrounded by white light.

Furthermore, two original musical visions —Lo bon pobre [The good poor one, probably a parody of The bad rich one] and Àngels de la Terra [Angels of Earth]— were premiered on November 23rd and 28th, credited to local anonymous authors from the city of Sabadell. Each was performed between 3 and 4 times. All the musical vision sessions were also accompanied by cinematographic projections of a morally instructive nature for the children, as well as enriched with "listenings", brief musical concerts given by the resident quartet that played in the hall.

However, subsequent events suggest that the newly established company was not able to become firmly established. On November 20th, the price of tickets was reduced with the aim of facilitating access for a broader public audience, and the musical quartet was reduced into a trio. One general ticket reached the extremely low price of 15 cents, and a preference ticket was set at 25 cents. The boxes that hosted up to six people costed 2.25 pesetas.

The hall hosted events on Sundays and holidays from 15:30 on along the whole day, while on Saturdays the activity began at 21:00, exclusively open in the evening. On a weekend, they arranged a total of 8 sessions. On December 2nd, the press issued its final announcement regarding a stage performance. After this, the room will be kept open for the purpose of film screenings. The last recorded weekend in which the hall was opened is March 7th and 8th, 1908, offering cinematographic sessions.

❖ Sala Imperi (Barcelona)

Since its opening on April 9th, 1909, the "sala Imperi" or Empire hall was employed for a variety of purposes for a period of approximately 10 years. The venue, which was located at 245 Diputació Street in Barcelona, had a maximum capacity of 1,200 spectators. Its billboard primarily announced variety shows, zarzuela performances and cinematographic screenings, but throughout its active period the hall also hosted musical visions, children's theater and puppet companies.

The building also housed a café on the lower floor, where chess —a game that was gaining popularity at the time— was typically played. Several local chess championships were actually held in the Empire hall. The venue also frequently hosted political rallies of various ideological orientations. In fact, the rally that initiated the regional protests against the "decret de notaries" —named by the press as the "second chapter of Solidaritat Catalana[661]"— was held here during the season of musical visions directed by Marinel·lo.

The complex also had gardens where circus performances were held during one of the seasons, as well as other more criticized activities such as the "matança del negre[662]" or "negros slaughter" (most likely imitating the public lynchings of African Americans that also occurred in the US at the time). The news media reported this exhibition until Baldomer Marinel·lo installed his company in the hall and, according to the moral profile of his shows for children, forced its cancellation.

The musical visions were introduced to the Empire hall in September 1911 by Baldomer Marinel·lo, the lead actor of the company to take residence there. His familiarity with this lyric genre came from the times when he started acting as a member of the dramatic section of the Mercè hall, under the artistic direction of Lluís Graner[663]. The company had to stop acting in the Mercè hall due to the new municipal regulations of Barcelona that prohibited theatrical performances within cinematographic venues. Marinel·lo had been, actually, the actor who led the company during its tour to the theater of the Centre de Lectura in Reus in 1908 after the closing of their residence hall in Barcelona.

Following Graner's definitive departure from the artistic direction of the Mercè hall in 1910, Marinel·lo assumed the promotion of the musical visions genre in Barcelona, establishing his company in the Empire hall. He was assisted by his brother, Manuel Marinel·lo, who contributed as a playwright, and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, who collaborated as a composer. Their repertoire also featured works by Adrià Esquerrà, Nogueras Oller, and Joan Fargas. All of them had previously collaborated with the dramatic companies led by Lluís Graner.

The repertoire, following the guidelines established by the Mercè hall, was particularly oriented towards the younger audience. The company showed a predisposition for pieces with moral and censored content, suitable for families. It also had a close relationship with the Carlist and traditionalist youth entities. For example, the lyric legend Griselda was performed at the Empire hall, as previously premiered by the Traditionalist Youth of Sarrià[664], and the Carlists association of requetés decided to celebrate the day of the Immaculate Virgin —their saint patron— in the Empire hall[665]. They also celebrated especial sessions that destined the profit to religious entities, like the Provintial House of Charity or the Schools of Faith Preservation.

The musical visions that were premiered in the Empire hall were based on a variety of sources that included children's fables, legends, and folktales. Additionally, some of these musical compositions incorporated Christian themes, which were intended to be represented during religious festivities such as Christmas and the Three Wise Men's Day.

The formal composition of these pieces adheres to the principles established by the preceding repertoire of musical visions: brief compositions containing one to three musical numbers, featuring multiple instrumental fragments that can be easily integrated with the narrative action to facilitate a seamless transition between verbal and musical elements.

The musical parts were composed for a quartet, consisting of first and second violin, double bass, and harmonium, in addition to the voices. The notable presence of child actors can be used to underscore the centrality of children, as similarly emphasized in the original Mercè hall, involving them in the performative activity of the venue.

The musical visions premiered at the Empire hall mostly belonged to the subgenre of staged children's tales, usually called by the press "rondalla escènica" [scenic tale] or "conte líric" [lyric story]. These often maintained fantastic characters and medieval sets typical of folk myths and legends, although their dramaturgy left aside the initial Symbolist treats to follow a narrative development of the tale and an eventual moral teaching for the kids' audience. Some of the remarkable titles that were premiered for this season were La pomera [The apple tree] and L'infant príncep [The infant prince].

Although the text of La pomera has not been located, the author Manuel Marinel·lo published the following year a novelistic version of the tale. Contrasted with the musical numbers written by Montserrat Ayarbe, it can be confirmed that it's the same story. An old king cherishes an apple tree from his garden; however, one day he finds the log cut down. In profound sorrow, he sends his guards to look for the perpetrator. However, it was his son, who stands up to recognize his blame and, in return for his honesty, the king forgives him and includes the axe he used in their coat of arms. The novelistic version focuses on the king, presenting one scene during the day and another one in the evening, focusing each one on a different emotion of the character. Symbolically, the life of the tree is matched by the moment of the day: when it's cut down, the sun is setting and the day is arriving to its end. However, compared with the musical score for the theatrical version, the play would have included some more action on scene. There are an instrumental prelude and a folk-styled song that the king sings during the first scene, and another musical number sung by the prince when he finds the axe that he wants to try out, before accidentally cutting down the whole tree. In the novel, this scene is explained by the prince to his father but not narrated.

L'infant príncep is a fairytale by Josep Maria Navarro Porcel in two short scenes about a kid that his mother despises and kicks out of his home. A fairy appears when he's outside crying by the door to explain that such a cruel woman couldn't be his mother, that he was stolen as a baby and is actually the son of the king. This scene includes a musical number sung by the fairy and an instrumental section while the kid is magically changed into clean clothes before ending the scene, both written by Montserrat Ayarbe. The second scene takes place in the garden of the palace, starting with a musical number in which the herald announces the return of the lost child. Another instrumental number is played while the kid is taken to the throne by the fairy. Once sitting there, the kid sees her woman he used to live with between the crowd and forgives her, hosting her with him in the palace.

Even if they are original stories and not stagings of retrieved folktales, they imitate the same style and resemble the folk-like ambience. These musical visions present the characteristic medievalized and nobiliary elements that formed the imagery of musical visions and present an atemporal idealized past. Although they are more narrative than Graner's first experimental visions (a few were even published as novelized stories), they still present little action on stage, focusing on the characters' feelings. As well, they end with a moral teaching, following the pedagogical nature of Graner's musical visions.

While these were newly written tales imitating the style of folk stories, there were also some productions that were directly based on folk glosses or quotations. For instance, the lyric legend Griselda, with text by Lluís Viladot and music by Joan Fargas, which was staged in October 1911. The piece had been originally premiered in 1909 at the Traditionalist Youth centre of Sarrià and it was based on a medieval romance by Bernat Metge from 15th century, which he translated from Petrarca's texts. It was now reprised at the Empire hall as a musical vision in three scenes, in what the press called "the first manifestation [at the Empire hall] of a genre that with no doubt will be very appreciated by the audience, that of the artistic musical visions that were so successful some years ago at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner at the Principal theater and at the Mercè hall[666]". As well, Les flors de maig [May's flowers] was a musical vision in 3 scenes premiered in December 1911, in which R. Jofre arranged for the stage the story from the homonymous folk song and used musical fragments from the existent harmonized version composed by Josep Anselm Clavé.

Some others, like L'escola dels somnis [The school of dreams], L'escarment [The chastisement], Don Panxo o en Bieló [Mr. Panxo or Bieló] and L'aigua de la vida [The water of life] were closer to the comic genre. Rather than a continuation of Symbolist aesthetics, this initiative focused on the moral and pedagogical aspects of Graner's project and dramaturgically aligned with the literary currents of children's theater.

L'escola dels somnis was the first lyric production of the company, premiered on September 16th. It seems to have imitated the division of the play in two levels that Adrià Gual had already designed for Blancaflor and that Graner had also used in some of his productions, like in La Fustots: reality that transitions into an ideal world existing in our imagination, eventually coming back to reality. The music consisted of 8 short musical moments composed by Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe, some of them as incidental instrumental music and some others as sung numbers. The characters that intervene are the dreaming children from the real world and the characters they imagine, which are the group of thieves, the captain and the princess that he wants to rescue. We can interpretate that it was a pirate's story.

L'escarment was announced as a lyric comedy or musical vision in 2 scenes. The text was written by Manuel Marinel·lo and, although the document has not been located, from the four songs that were written by Montserrat Ayarbe for the play, the plot can be intuited, given that the lyrics are used to describe the situation of the characters. These are Milia, the nosy lady that will end up receiving the chastisement that gives the play its title, her weeping son on the streets once the mother has been locked up, and a chorus of children singing about Milia's misbehaving and the reprisals she's received from her mother Marieta for dating men. The play most likely aimed to teach a moral lesson to children on how a lady and a mother should behave regarding her relations with men.

Don Panxo o en Bieló was a children's comedy in one act, written again by the duo formed by Manuel Marinel·lo and Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe. The action takes place in a town of the Vallès region, in the province of Barcelona. A group of children mock an elder man from town, while one of them feels compassion for him and doesn't want to misbehave. The man turned out to be a returned Catalan general from the military that had been destined to the American colonies and had returned to spend his old age years back in Catalonia. When the children are told off by the major and get to know who he is, they start feeling a new respect for him and change their attitude towards the man. The comedy includes multiple musical numbers that are non-verisimilar. Still, the press links this piece to the tradition of theater for children started at the Mercè hall: while Graner's musical visions were performed "to be seen" due to the predominance of plastic and visual elements in the dramaturgical conception, these still provide a moral and educational repertoire, but closer to the comic genre[667].

As for L'aigua de la vida, it was announced as a lyric comedy in 6 scenes, written by Josep Amic Bert, with music by Adrià Esquerrà and stage set designed by Francesc Arois. No documents have been located and very little detail was given by the press, but it's known that the play was inspired by a fantastic tale by the Brothers Grimm.

The last musical visions were performed in late December 1911. Nadal a muntanya [Christmas by the mountain], featuring music by Joan B. Lambert, was performed prior to Christmas Day, and the premiere of Rondalla de Reis [The Wise Men tale] was scheduled for January to coincide with the Three Wise Men's Day celebration. Nevertheless, the company had to interrupt its activity, thereby suspending the premiere of the latter musical vision.

According to press reports, an incident occurred in the final days of the year. The artist Francesc Arois i Sala, who had been commissioned to paint a scenic backdrop for Nadal a muntanya, reportedly caused significant damage to the curtain he had painted, tearing it in an act of revenge after not being paid for it[668]. The company was on the verge of economic bankruptcy, unable to manage its outstanding debts and invoices, including those owed to the painter-scenographer Arois.

In the early months of 1912, the company of the Empire hall, now under the single direction of Joan Ferrero, performed in the Círcol de Propietaris de Gràcia and at least their two female performers —Pepita Morer and Aurora Redondo— and the repertoire premiered in the Empire hall were integrated as part of the comic-lyric company installed at the Catalanist center Gent Nova in Badalona.

In the spring, the Empire hall became a "café cantante" or singing café and regularly featured couplet singers such as Raquel Meller, Tórtola Valencia, Paquita Escribano and Conchita Ledesma. In the summer of 1912, the Gran Guinyol Català company, directed by Santacana and Màntua, debuted in the Empire hall.

Later on, as a remarkable milestone, El amor brujo by Manuel de Falla —featuring Pastora Imperio as the protagonist under the musical direction of Amadeu Cristià i Rotches— was performed in June 1915 in the Empire hall as the Barcelona premiere[669]. In 1918, the venue ceased operations. It was then replaced by the Fabra i Coats department store, which was destroyed by a fire in May 1919.

❖ Cinematographic distribution

While the musical visions staged in these recreational venues are the focal point of this study, it is also worth to acknowledge the cinematographic screenings that occurred in these spaces and the influence that the Mercè hall —the first one inaugurated— had on the promotion and expansion of a network of Catalan and moral cinematographic halls.

The Mercè hall received a gold medal by the local authorities in recognition of the outstanding quality of its cinematographic screenings, qualified as the best movie hall in the urban center[670]. Notably, this distinguished space had pioneered a unique method known as the "spoken films", which involved actors delivering their dialogue live, synchronizing it with the visuals presented on screen[671].

This innovation was made possible by the actors' hidden presence in the hall, either positioned in the pit or behind the stage, contributing to an immersive auditory and visual experience for the audience. Since the use and promotion of Catalan language was one of the main goals on the hall's policies, the invention of these "spoken films" was probably caused by the need to include language on the movies that, at this moment, were still silent. It was an ingenious and simple way to solve technological impediments, although it made the screenings more expensive to produce, as the salary of the actors had to be paid.

In addition to acquiring films from prominent international film companies, like Pathé or Gaumont, the artistic team at the Mercè hall undertook the production of their own films during the first season, encompassing both documentary productions of popular events in the city and artistic depictions of dramatic plots. All of their cinematographic offer was thought out as moral content suitable for children and families, while the majority of halls in the city did not.

Consequently, the Mercè hall quickly emerged as a prominent film venue in Catalonia, renowned for the artistic quality of its productions, its exclusive right of screening and distribution of famous foreign titles, and its adherence to a moral standard. The model established by the example of the Mercè hall was characterized not only by its cinematographic offer, but also by the meticulous design of the space, including its artistic decoration and spaces dedicated to art installations.

This model of hall was to be replicated, emulated, or copied in other municipalities, becoming the reference for other artists that wanted to open their own recreational venues under the same ideological standards. New halls either compared themselves to the Mercè hall as a marketing strategy, or the press compared them to the Mercè hall, used as a standard reference to assess the novel recreational venues.

[671] MINGUET I BATLLORI, Joan M. (1995): "La «Sala Mercè», el primer cinematógrafo de la burguesía barcelonesa…", op. cit.

An illustrative example can be found in the Escudé cinema, which was inaugurated in Tortosa in 1905. After concluding his studies in drawing and painting in Barcelona and in architecture in Madrid, Francisco Escudé i Bosch (1867–1919) relocated to Tortosa in 1903. He had not fully completed, however, the requisite qualifications to practice as a professional architect[672]. Therefore, once in Tortosa, he opened a photographic workshop and conceived the Escudé cinema, an annex to the photography studio that functioned as a hall for cinema projections, art exhibitions, and other recreational shows, "just as the similar ones that we can find established on the big capitals[673]".

The hall's inauguration took place on June 29th, 1905, and it was adorned by the artists Cerveto and Fumadó. Both the design and the programming were inspired by the moral recreational hall concept exemplified by the Mercè hall, which prioritized artistic and moral educational content. The venue was situated on the street of the Station, accommodated 300 spectators, and featured electric lighting. The influence of the Mercè hall is not only implicit, but noticed by the press:

> "[…] Shall Mr. Escudé receive our applause for providing Tortosa with a hall that will honor the city and that, if maybe after some time it could even become a reflection of the Mercè hall in Barcelona, will be not only a place for entertainment, but also for culture, in which our people will learn without studying. […][674]"

Beyond serving merely reference for imitation or comparison, the Mercè room also directly contributed to the dissemination of its model. Lluís Graner, endorsing the spread of musical visions in other municipalities, facilitated the distribution of titles and stage sets to colleague halls in various locations, including those in Terrassa and Sabadell. In congruence with these policies, Graner extended his patronage as well to other cinemas, providing them with tapes and films for which he possessed exclusive distribution rights. These were the cases of the second Mercè hall, located in Arenys de Mar, and the Valls hall, situated in the homonymous town of Valls.

- Sala Mercè (Arenys de Mar)

The new Mercè hall, located at 54 Riera del Bisbe Pol, opened up in 1906 with the assistance of Lluís Graner, owner and director of the Mercè hall in Barcelona, from which this new venue borrows its name. Its intention was, as the rest of institutions in the network, to offer morally uplifting and censored cinema suitable for family viewing.

> "Arenys de Mar [...] The Sunday before the Virgin of August's day, the cinematographer of the Mercè hall that two gentlemen of this town, with the cooperation of Mr. Graner, from Barcelona, have installed in a spacious place at the Riera began working.
> Since it's running, Saturdays and Sundays, all sessions have been very busy. Congratulations to the initiators, since this opening constitutes a healthy act of culture for our town[675]."

The cinema was housed on the ground floor of the building. Besides the projections hall, the venue also had a waiting room, as did the original Mercè hall designed by Gaudí. The project was founded and promoted by Josepa Espriu and her brother Francesc Espriu (who were aunt and uncle of the writer Salvador Espriu).

The ideological controversies among the residents of Arenys involved the Mercè hall, which was known for its emphasized morality of its programming, leading to criticism from certain sectors, in addition to the prevailing commercial rivalry.

> "On every session, this amusement looks even more crowded, the only one that nowadays sells out and fills its showroom with the inhabitants of Arenys with no class distinction.
> We had seen on very few occasions an amusement in our town that becomes as popular as the Mercè hall, located at the Riera, is. Although we, and many others, like and are delighted with it, and we as well as look at it with satisfaction, it seems that not everyone does. We thought someone could find something to miss, since it's an innocent entertainment and the venue only screens films that can't offend anyone's feelings and that can be watched by the youngest and oldest public and all kinds of families. […] we are completely amazed that a place that could only be a shelter for devout souls, for mercy and piety, has been badly criticized, treating it as indecent, dishonest and indecorous, making comments and murmuring about some of the films. Only a badly intentioned person could see an immorality here; they don't exist. […]
>
> We're not advertising propaganda about this venue, only watching over the decency and honesty of many families that have been questioned. We protest, not only against the words that labeled this cinema of our town as a dishonest amusement, but also against the trend and unsettling spirit that those words allude to. […]
> B. Aranyó[676]"

Since its inauguration, the partner Mercè hall in Barcelona had faced a similar consistent opposition from anti-Catholic and anti-Catalanist media. These groups openly expressed disapproval of the institution's moral censorship policies and its engagement with ecclesiastical personalities. Conversely, religious and traditionalist newspapers provided robust endorsement and advocated for the provision of moral culture for families with children. This ideological division permeated the whole socio-cultural landscape of the era.

Notwithstanding this initial setback, the hall proved to be a success. Consequently, in 1913, the decision was made to renovate the building, with the objective of enlarging the cinema. This expansion included the addition of a theatrical stage with a painted curtain, projected to host performances during the cinematograph sessions. The newly renovated venue opened on April 13th, 1913, as well as a café called Lion d'Or that was located facing the street also on the ground floor along with the cinema.

However, due to the financial demands associated with the theater's maintenance, the Espriu family opted to list the property for sale. The building was purchased in 1919 by Mr. Olivella, a member of the Barcelona City Council, and rumors began to circulate about its demolition. Ultimately, the cinema remained in its original state, and on that same year, the rival cinema Doré acquired the Mercè hall and resumed operations at the cinematographer. Notwithstanding, the Esprius reserved their permanent right to occupy a box with six chairs[677]. Although the activity in the hall continued, it did so with commercial programming no longer connected to the exhibition of moral cinema, breaking all ties with the previous policies adopted from Graner's original Mercè hall.

The Mercè hall maintained continuous operations at its cinema for a period spanning multiple decades. It only remained closed after a substantial snowfall on February 26th, 1962 left the venue in a state of disrepair and inaccessible to the audience, resulting in the collapse of its roof. The venue remained closed until July 8th, 1968, when it was reopened following its reconstruction. It would not be until 1986 that the Mercè eventually ceased its activity. The building was subsequently demolished to make way for a new residential building.

- Sala Valls (Valls)

The "Sala Valls", or Valls hall, was installed on the ground floor of Casa Cartanyà, in front of the Principal theater of the municipality of Valls. According to rental ads following its closure, the premises were located at "Arrabal de Capuchinos, n. 7". Previously, in 1901, the Círculo Republicano Democrático Federal and the editorial board of El Trabajo: Semanario Republicano, Democrático, Federal y Socialista had been installed on the same floor[678]. The El Trabajo newspaper closed in 1903, and the party Círculo Republicano disbanded in 1905. On August 2nd, 1903, Juan Cartañà Dalmau, the head of the Cartanyà family and owner of the building, died[679].

The director of the Valls hall was Romà[680] Closa i Nolla, a film business-man from Barcelona who had direct contacts with film companies in Paris. Initially planned for the beginning of February 1907, the opening was delayed by various personal matters of the employer until Thursday, February 7th of that year. The venue had a waiting room and then a showroom. On the day of the inauguration, the projector had a lantern illuminated by a 2,000-lumen light that operated with 65-degree rectified ether[681]. There was also a suitable screen for projecting static images.

The Valls hall exclusively projected films that were distributed by the Mercè hall in Barcelona, thereby maintaining its censored character and adherence to Catholic morality. The Catholic press of Valls supported this venue over other cinematographers, such as the Modern cinema, a direct competitor that was installed on the ground floor of the Principal theater, just across the street in front of the Valls hall. The venue offered two daily sessions, at 9:30 and 10:30 p.m., but the schedule was extended on holidays with hourly sessions from 3:30 p.m. to midnight.

"Notes from Valls [...]

New cinema.— Within a few days, a new cinematographer will be installed in the Valls hall by the businessman Mr. Romà Closa, from Barcelona: the films that will be exhibited will be completely moral and most of them will be the same as the ones exhibited in the Mercè hall in Barcelona. If we are to judge by the preparations that are made in the Valls venue, the cinematographic apparatus that has been picked up from Paris must be up to the highest expectations. The impresario is a correspondent for one of the houses in Paris that sell films for cinematographers, which indicates that those to be exhibited in this new hall will be very recent[682]."

For the second season (1908/09), they hired a musical group to provide live music performances in the hall. Occasionally, multidisciplinary artists and couplet singers performed in the venue to compete with the variety shows flooding the city's showrooms at that time. This drew severe criticism from Catholic newspapers such as La Veritat, which singled out the Valls room because it was inaugurated advertising a moral code that it soon broke[683].

In September 1909, the third season started. The first ads published in the press announced screenings scheduled for the weekends. Apart from that, the only extraordinary records we have are the cinematographic sessions scheduled for the Santa Úrsula fairs in late October and the San Juan Bautista fairs in late June.

The next mention about the Valls hall appeared in the press in November 1911, when the venue was advertised for rent in the newspaper[684]. Later, in 1912, all of the machinery from the Valls hall was listed for sale[685]. The Suizo café would later be installed at the emptied hall.

Chapter 10:
Venues with brief seasons of musical visions: from private companies to civil Catholic societies

Beyond the network directly linked to the Mercè hall, the place of origin of musical visions, the genre was found appealing by many other venues and cultural centers throughout Catalonia. This chapter will present the multiple halls, dramatic troupes, and Catholic and moral centers that offered, at some point of their lifespan, brief seasons of musical visions.

Besides the capital city, other municipalities such as Manresa, Olot, Arenys de Mar, and Tarragona featured multiple halls where this symbolist theatrical genre was performed. The following listing of venues is arranged in chronological order according to the inauguration of the seasons of musical visions, with the exception of the Euterpe hall, which corresponds to a direct continuation of the Montserrat hall and, consequently, is positioned subsequent to it.

The span of venues dedicated to musical visions covers most of the cultural scene of Catalonia, geographically and socially. The diversity of documented spaces indicates the wide adoption of the genre, not only by recreational venues led by painters and other plastic artists such as Graner, Vancells or Masó, but also by amateur dramatic troupes, Catholic and moral centers, and commercial theaters. Even some of them were personal initiatives, such as the Domènech family theater in their private tower in Olot.

It is noteworthy that the majority of the halls that hosted musical visions did not program them as sporadic premieres over time, but rather as brief seasons that were meticulously programmed from the artistic direction. Along with the programming of the pieces, a sociopolitical program is also implicit, since the genre has been closely linked since its origins to the promotion of Catholic morality and traditional values. Therefore, it was not only an aesthetic decision, but a sociopolitical positioning.

In certain instances, such as the Montserrat hall in Manresa or the Montserrat hall in Arenys de Mar, it is evident that the endeavor to implement the genre proved unsuccessful. This outcome can be attributed to the public's predilection for the comic theatrical genre, which made artistic directors shift back to the programming of comedies. Other notable cases include the theater of the Patronat de l'Obrer de Tarragona and the Catholic Centre of Olot, which were personal projects aimed at infusing the genre into existing dramatic groups. These projects concluded upon the cessation of the respective directors' involvement.

Although none of them had a particularly long life, the identification of this network is of vital relevance to realize the geographical span of the genre and to understand how it was publicly perceived and commercially distributed. Firstly, after presenting the diverse initiatives that implemented the genre on their venues, we can assure that the musical visions —and the movement of Catalan lyric theater altogether— were not only a urban phenomenon given in the capital city, but a regional movement. It mobilized multiple intellectuals and artists, as well as civil and religious associations, from the professional and the amateur fields, in the different provincial capitals of Catalonia, as well as in secondary and smaller municipalities.

Secondly, unlike other genres within the repertoire of Catalan lyric theater that under formal criteria could be labelled as "Catalan zarzuela", the musical visions showed a distinctive dramaturgy and aesthetics that allowed both the critics and the general public to distinguish them from other genres in the lyric repertoire that shared similarities and that could interchange their generic label. Not only intellectuals that understood the symbolist and suggestive dramaturgy behind them were able to identify them, but also the general public, even in the smaller municipalities, was able to tell apart from musical visions and other lyric genres, that generally grouped under the generic label of "zarzuela". The initiatives and venues presented here are proof of the artistic interest that the arrival of the musical visions supposed and the activist efforts that their promoters made to bring them on stage.

The spreading of the genre is also proof of the public impact and media repercussion that the Mercè hall had in the Catalan cultural life, further that just in Barcelona. Most of the venues documented here were directly inspired by Graner's project, even sometimes reporting on the press the importation of this genre from Barcelona as an appeal. However, they invested in the production of musical visions on their own initiative, unlike the network aforementioned on the previous chapter, that enjoyed direct support from Lluís Graner.

Between the advertising materials edited by the Mercè hall, there was even a comic strip including children from further towns in Catalonia taking the train to go to the Mercè hall in Barcelona. Taking into consideration that local authors and artists in other provinces knew this genre and programmed similar plays for children in their towns, maybe the comic strip was not exaggerating excessively. In fact, the press also reports that some stage productions at the Mercè hall were prolonged because of public demand from people from outside the city that hadn't had time yet to go see them.

❖ Sala Montserrat and Sala Euterpe (Manresa)

> "Under the name of Sala Montserrat, the new hall will be opened soon in the building of Mr. Miró, in the Saint Domingo square. It will be a venue destined to cinematographic projections and dioramas, plastic tableaux and other artistic shows. We have had the opportunity to see the decoration project for the façade, made by the distinguished painter Mr. Cuixart, which we do not doubt that will attract attention for its originality and good taste[686]."

On July 23rd, 1905, the newly established troupe of the Montserrat hall commenced its operations in the city of Manresa, remaining active for a period of four seasons. The initial programming of the venue consisted of cinematographic and photographic projections accompanied by "quadros vivents" or "living paintings" and other shows.

The inaugural "musical living painting", accompanied by music and declamation, was El canonge Mulet, which presented the historical events of the murder of the canon at the Holy See of Manresa in 1428. The backcloth, designed by the artistic director of the hall, Francisco Cuixart, represented a painted view of the interior of the basilica of Manresa where the events took place. The piece was performed at the end of every cinematographic session, and the price was 15 cents for a general entry and 25 cents for a preference seat. It was staged on two Sundays, August 29th and September 17th, 1905.

The artistic creations in question have been referred to by the press as "quadros plàstics musicals" or "musical plastic tableaux". These creations incorporate both a dramaturgical model and a thematic content that mirrors that of musical visions, drawing inspiration from local legends, historical and religious episodes, and children's fables. The resulting plastic tableaux were also based on symbolist suggestion through poetry, music and visual effects. Under the artistic direction of a painter, the backcloths of the stage were pictured as giant paintings that were coming lo life through the live lighting design, the movement of the actors and the music.

Francisco Cuixart i Barjau (1875–1931) worked as the artistic director and set designer of the Montserrat hall. Indeed, Cuixart pursued a career as a painter following his studies at La Llotja art school in Barcelona, the same place where Lluís Graner had studied. Among his pieces are numerous paintings of the Peninsular War (1808-1814) and the design of the coat of arms of the Orfeó Manresà and the Promotion of the Sardana in the region of Bages[687].

Between El canonge Mulet and the next "living painting", the hall hosted a puppet show coming from Els quatre gats in Barcelona, as well as other varieties artists. On November 19th, 1905, the hall relocated to a more spacious venue in a building also owned by Oleguer Miró in the Fius and Palà square of Manresa, situated between the streets Mestre Blanch and Sant Domènec. Francisco Cuixart was himself the designer of the new hall's façade, which was situated on the ground floor of the Miró house. Along with Cuixart, Miró was also affiliated with the Regionalist League, the conservative nationalist party of Catalonia.

Following the inauguration of the refurbished hall, the season continued to stage these musical plastic tableaux, directly influenced by Graner's view and the musical visions. Such titles as Jesús a l'hort (representing the biblical episode), La torre de la minyona (based on a legend of Manresa), and La filadora (glossing the homonymous folk song) were featured.

Jesús a l'hort [Jesus by the orchard] presented on stage the biblical episode of Christ's last prayer by the orchard, such as L'oració a l'hort did during the first season of musical visions at the Mercè hall. It was performed after the screening of different short movies also based on Catholic themes, since the sessions took place close to the Holy Week. The backdrop, painted by Francisco Cuixart, portrayed a landscape of the orchard under a mystical atmosphere.

It was followed by El fill del rei [The king's son], premiered in May and reprised in June. The homonymous folk song had been staged at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner, but this time, the title corresponded to a piece written by Manuel Alabert that used a chorus by Mendelssohn with lyrics translated into Catalan, without a clear reference that it glossed the aforementioned folk song. Another piece that is confirmed to be based on the folk song that shares its title is La filadora [The spinner], adapted by Martí Genís and harmonized by J. Cortinas, the conductor of the band in the city of Vic, where the piece was later performed too.

Borràs de Palau, who had collaborated with the Mercè hall, also wrote the music for L'anell malastruc [The wretched ring], premiered at the Montserrat hall. Although the plot is not known, the press praised the stage set, claiming that a bigger stage would be needed for the painter to fully express their potential. A palace was painted as the background for this piece. It's worth noting that the press, instead of providing details on the plots and characteristics of the pieces, focused their words instead to praise the visual stagings, mostly painted by Francisco Cuixart in collaboration with Andreu Noguera.

Musical visions based on historical legends can also be found in the Montserrat hall. La torre de la minyona [The girl's tower], with lyrics also by Alabert and music by Josep Masó, staged the homonymous popular legend well-known in Manresa. The tower mentioned in the title actually exists in Cardona. According to the legend, it was inhabited by a Count during the Muslim invasion of the peninsula. He invited one of the Muslims for a visit, who fell in love with his daughter, and they were secretly seeing each other trying to avoid starting a conflict between both peoples. Once the father found out, he locked the girl in the famous tower until she died out of sorrow after painting a cross at her door, proving she had never lost her Catholic faith. It's not known if the legend was altered for its staging as a musical vision in Manresa.

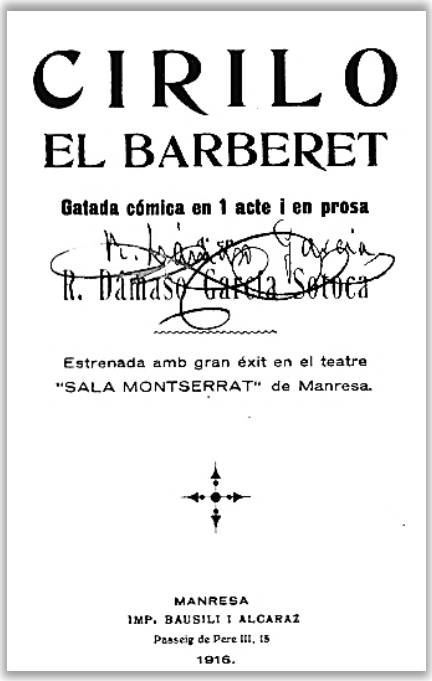
The hall was open on weekends and holidays, with schedules that varied according to the time of year or specific festivities. Generally, sessions were offered on Saturday evenings (from 8:00 p.m. on), Sunday mornings (from 9:00 a.m. or 12:00 p.m. on), and afternoons (from 3:00 p.m. or 6:00 p.m. on). The duration of these sessions was approximately an hour. Tickets were available for purchase at a rate of 0.25 pesetas for those with preference and 0.15 pesetas for the general public.

The first season would have been directly influenced by the activity of the Mercè hall, imitating the genre of musical visions under the involvement of its artistic director Francisco Cuixart. They even managed to screen in Manresa some selected movies that had been previously shown at the Mercè hall, using that as an advertising claim:



> "Among the films that will be shown tomorrow at the Montserrat hall are L'acordeon misteriós, which has been very successful at the Mercè hall in Barcelona, and the new and very funny ones titled Noi entremaliat i Se desitja un gos guardià. Also, the comic dialogue Anar per llana, full of jokes, will be premiered[688]."

Besides this one from the Mercè hall, they usually brought movies from the Pathé and Gaumont houses.

While this first season focused on the performance of "living paintings" and "musical plastic tableaux", the hall's program also encompassed a broader range of genres and shows. In addition to the puppet shows, imitation acts, and equilibristic performances, several zarzuela titles were announced, accompanied by choral music, such as the Catalan El soldat i la criada [The Soldier and the Maid], accompanied by piano and violin, or others in Spanish, such as El brazalete de oro and El ramo mágico. In subsequent seasons, the prominence of comic genres increased. From the second season on, in an effort to increase public attention and minimize costs, the repertoire underwent a substantial transformation. The staging of musical pieces and plastic tableaux declined notably, and a concomitant emphasis was made on comic pieces that employed preexisting stage sets.

[688] El pla de Bages 723 (25/08/1906), p. 2 [originally in Catalan].

A comprehensive list of the actors and actresses who constituted the cast the Montserrat hall can be compiled through the advertisements of the various productions that appeared throughout the three seasons. The cast comprised at least six women, with Pilar Laffitte as the lead actress, and at least seven men, highlighting the popularity of Dámaso García, Jacinto Girbau, and Josep Singla. The group also included at least six young boys and two girls. The individuals constituting the company were not professional actors; rather, they were amateur enthusiasts.

It is noteworthy that several of the young actors also contributed original works, which premiered at the Montserrat hall. This can be illustrated by the case of Jacinto Girbau, whose dramatic scene La calumnia and his comedy Un capritxo com un altre exemplify this phenomenon. Similarly, the comedy Un sabater de pega by Josep Singla demonstrates this trend. Additionally, García, in collaboration with Àngel Mata, wrote the comedy El testament d'en Secall, which premiered in July 1907, further supporting this argument. A select collection of these titles were published, including those by R. Dámaso García, like Cirilo, el barberet.

During the 1906/07 season, comedies characterized by humor and jokes will be prioritized, while lyrical and musical works will be drastically reduced. Furthermore, invitations to artists from external venues will not be extended. The performance of comedic and dramatic works will be exclusively undertaken by the resident company of the hall.

During the Easter holidays of 1908, the repertoire will feature dramatic pieces, including La calumnia by Jacinto Girbau and Mossèn Eudald by Àngel Mata. The biblical piece entitled La fi de Judes, premiered for Palm Sunday of 1907 is particularly noteworthy. Writen by Marc Miravitllas, it draws inspiration from the drama Jesús de Nazaret by Àngel Guimerà[689], with a new set designed by Mr. Cuixart.

During the remaining of the season, the hall experienced significant success, becoming (or at least being proclaimed by the press) one of the most popular spaces in Manresa for its comedies and films that aligned with moral principles:

> "On each session, the public that frequents the Montserrat hall is more numerous. And that's not strange. The shows that take place there, all of them of good kind, and the artistic taste with which the performances are executed by the consummate actors Mr. Garcia, Tarrés and others, and the > distinguished Miss Pilar Laffitte, who so naturally plays her difficult roles, accompanied by the important cinematographic films, make people frequent the increasingly favored Montserrat hall[690].”

[689] A scene from Guimerà's Jesús de Nazaret was also used by the original authors to compose a new musical vision for the Espectacles-Audicions Graner during this season, and the whole drama would be staged at the Principal theater of Barcelona on the following season.

The only musical piece of the season is the comic-musical scene L'hereu [The Heir], with lyrics by Marc Miravitllas and music based on the homonymous folk song harmonized by Francesc Alió. The name of Marc Miravitllas is, in fact, one of the most frequent among playwrights who wrote pieces for the Montserrat hall.

The 1907/08 season was inaugurated with El mestre de pàrvuls, a comic sketch by Miravitllas that received a favorable critique. During the Christmas season, the hall would bring back the lyric repertoire, staging L'infant Jesús o Els pastorets de Betlem [The Child Jesus or The Shepherds of Bethlehem], which would be reprised in February. It is also worth mentioning other comedy titles that premiered during the winter of 1907, including the humorous comedy La broma de don Serafí and the humorous knightly piece Els castell dels esguerrats, featuring a luxurious set design and new costumes.

During the Easter season, the company resumed its practice of screening films on Catholic subjects and released two new lyrical pieces based on religious topics: La samaritana, “biblical sketch with a great set” by Marc Miravitllas and music by Iscle Tomàs, and Pasqua florida, “dramatic sketch with a choir of caramellaire [folk singing] boys”, by Àngel Mata and music by the same Iscle Tomàs. Additionally, the biblical drama in two scenes by Marc Miravitllas El decret del rei Herodes was premiered, and La fi de Judes was reprised. These two pieces, however, did not include any music.

Nonetheless, the prevailing repertoire remains oriented towards comedic pieces, including both comic sketches and plays for children, such as Un sabater de pega [A Fake Shoemaker] by Josep Singla, who also performed as an actor. Additionally, entertainment games will be offered, including a raffle stand and the drawing of gifts based on the numbers of entry tickets.

In January of 1909, the last lyrical productions of the hall were premiered. Following Els pastorets nous on the 5th, the musical vision in three scenes Diada de reis [The Three Kings Day] —also announced on the press under the title La nit dels reis— was performed. Written by Dámaso García and Àngel Mata, and accompanied with music by Iscle Tomàs, it was a suitable title for the Christmas mood of the season. La minyona de la costa [The girl from the coast], a dramatic-lyric sketch by Àngel Mata with music by Iscle Tomàs was also premiered on January 31st.

The 1908/09 season marked the culmination of the hall's activities. July 18th was the last day on which it opened its doors, and on August 25th, it was announced that the venue had already been dismantled. However, the company and team of authors that had led the Montserrat hall continued their operations and relocated to a new facility. On December 5th, 1909, they resumed their activities in the Euterpe hall, which was installed on the ground floor of the Euterpe theater.

The building of the Euterpe theater in Manresa housed a cinematographic hall that engaged in parallel activities to those on stage. The previous company that had been installed there, which commenced its activities in January 1908, called it "Saló de Novetats". This initial period featured a brief tour of the company of the Sala Mercè company from Barcelona and their repertoire of musical visions, which occurred shortly after the prohibition that forced the suspension of live performances in their hall.

However, by the beginning of the 1909 season, both the cinema and the main stage of the theater remained closed. Nonetheless, on December 5th the cinematographic hall was reopened under the new name of Sala Euterpe:

> "The company of the Euterpe hall intends to give, alternated with the cinematographic projections, spectacular performances of lyrical-dramatic pieces. We wish the company that good taste guides them and that success crowns their efforts[691]."

On the one hand, it revived the building of the Euterpe theater that had ended up inactive, and on the other, it meant the continuation of the Montserrat hall that had ceased operations at the conclusion of the previous season.

The Euterpe hall, therefore, featured once again the same actors and authors who had been involved in the Montserrat hall. The cast includes the following individuals: Agneta García, Mrs. Laffitte, Mrs. Piqué, Mr. Pons, Mr. Font, Mr. Planas, Mr. Tañà, Mr. Garcia, and the Santamaria brothers. The list of authors includes the composer Iscle Tomàs, and the playwright Marc Miravitllas, who was also in charge of giving voice to the films. Both Miravitllas and Tomàs had been close collaborators of the Montserrat hall.

The Euterpe hall was the only spoken cinematographic hall in Manresa, worth mentioning that it did so in Catalan language. This practice was consistent with the method patented by Lluís Graner at the Mercè hall, a technique in which actors positioned within the stage's pit delivered their dialogues live while the movie was being screened.

Furthermore, one of the musical visions staged was drawn from the repertoire of the Montserrat hall. Diada de reis had its premiere in January 1909 in the Montserrat hall and was reprised in January 1910 at the new Euterpe hall, which likely featured the same scenery of the original production that represented the interior of the basilica of Manresa, painted by Francisco Cuixart. Other musical visions that premiered in the Euterpe hall are Lo palau de l'enveja [The palace of envy], and La mort de l'escolanet [The death of the little altar boy].

Lo palau de l'enveja was a musical comedy in 5 scenes premiered on December 5th, 1909, with music by Iscle Tomàs. From what's known from the press reviews, it included a musical prayer and a choir of goblins, indicating its moral character[692]. The press mention to the characters "Pere Botero" and "Banyeta" suggests that the piece could be based on Botero's legendary trip to hell, which was a popular tale for kids at the time that had also been staged at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner as Las calderes d'en Pere Botero [Pere Botero's cauldrons] and the theme for a plastic installation at the sala Mercè inaugurated on that same year under the title El palau d'en Banyeta [The palace of the horned demon].

La mort de l'escolanet was a lyric-dramatic vision in 3 scenes, based, as well as the version premiered at the Mercè hall in 1905, in the homonymous poem by Jacint Verdaguer about the death of a child from the school in the Montserrat chapel. The piece was premiered on December 19th, 1909, with lyrics arranged by Marc Miravitllas and stage design by Joan Coma. It reportedly was a very sentimental and emotional piece that even included the burial of the little boy. The version premiered in Barcelona, using the choir arrangement written by Antoni Nicolau, had reached a high popularity and it had been staged also at religious schools in Terrassa and Olot in 1908 and at the Traditionalist Circle of Sabadell in 1909.

A close examination of the extant hand programs reveals that the venue offered a diverse and appealing selection of cinematic projections, including spoken ones, colored, and of extended duration. In addition, a musical quintet performed interludes, and the company also performed a range of lyric genres, including musical comedy and zarzuela. A selection of the titles that were announced includes the zarzuelas De Girona al polo Nord [From Girona to the North Pole], which features a girls' choir; ¡Viva mi niña! [Hurray for my girl!], in Spanish; and Els pastorets nous [The new little shepherd], a piece by Joaquim Estebanell that premiered in 1903 at the Círcol Manresà.

However, the Euterpe hall was not open for a particularly extended period. The establishment had been inaugurated in December of 1909 and offered seasonal programming during the winter months. By April of 1910, the latest news regarding its activities were released.

It is noteworthy for being one of the final major events, if not the very final one serving as a closing ceremony, the itinerant visit of the company of Teatre Líric Català from Barcelona, directed by Joaquim Viñas and Maria Morera:

> "Sala Euterpe.— The Teatre Líric Català, directed by Joaquim Viñas and Maria Morera, has worked in this theater for the Easter holidays, staging with extraordinary success La flor tardana, L'alegria que passa, La reina vella, La reina del cor and La festa major[693]."

No further news about the venue were disclosed afterwards, until one year later the hall reopened under its previous name of "Saló de Novetats".

❖ Torre Domènech (Olot)

The Torre Domènech was the Domènech Rouret family's recreational theater, installed in the tower that was part of their villa on Passeig de Barcelona, an extension of Olot with stately summer houses. Josep Domènech Rouret, the owner of the house-tower, directed the theatrical initiative with the collaboration of his brother, Manel Domènech Rouret.

Manel used to publish poetry and excerpts from his work in the Font Nova newspaper based in Camprodon. Though his pieces are signed from Barcelona, he had a lot of contact with the Girona region. Some of the first titles he wrote are Un fracàs!, a comic monologue from 1900 in one act, and Los amors de l'Elvira o L'aprenent nou. From 1901 on, Manel Domènech Rouret pieces started to be published in Girona. The author visited Olot in the summers to organize theatrical seasons in the family tower, where he would assume responsibility for the staging.

The aforementioned newspaper, Font Nova, published in April 1906 a fragment of Manel's La rondalla de l'avi [Granpa's tale], a musical vision that was to be presented at the Mercè hall in Barcelona. Despite being announced as a premiere for the following theatrical season, the piece was not staged nor released. The musical score was composed by Salvador Bartolí, who would later compose the music for the vision Tal faràs... [You will do so…], premiered in August 1907 at the Mercè hall, and for La llar [Home], premiered in March 1908 at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

This interest in the musical visions presented during the previous spring would result in the family theater season of the summer of 1906, during which at least two musical visions were premiered at the Domènech's tower: De bon matí [Early in the morning] and La cova de l'amor [Love's cave], both with music by Josep Domènech and stage design by Manel Domènech.

Despite the press characterizing Josep as an "accredited dramatic author", there is no extant record of his writings. During this summer season, although some other dramatic pieces were also staged, he was only credited as the author of the music for these two musical visions. It seems that he could have been involved in the performance of the pieces as an actor as well.

The summer season started on July 9th, 1906, presented its last performance on September 15th, marking the culmination of the theatrical experience of the Domènech Rouret family:

> "According to the statement of a friend of ours, the accredited playwright D. José Domènech Rouret, with the show played on the 15th of this past September in the theater of his house-tower in Olot, he retired from performing arts.
> We regret the determination of the artist, when, in the peak of his life, the performance of his roles made the delights of everyone who witnessed them[694]."

❖ Portfoliògraf (Barcelona)

The Portfoliògraf hall first opened its doors on December 23rd, 1906. The venue was installed at number 14 on Vergara Street (facing the corner with Plaça de Catalunya), in front of the Eldorado theater. Its primary programming consisted of cinematographic screenings, featuring performances by artists specializing in various performing arts. On Thursdays, the hall organized the "días de moda" or "trend days" for children. As for the staff of the hall, Miquel Vallcorba i Ballesteros (1875–1962) has been identified as the projectionist of the cinematographic apparatus.

In the final weeks of May 1907, the hall disclosed to the press the imminent presentation of a sort of "new show", which was to be the musical visions. Three new titles were premiered prior to the season's conclusion. The cast included Enric Guitart as the primary performer, leading a company that also comprised Mr. Ferrer and Mr. Rodríguez, along with Mrs. Gotarrodona and Mrs. Piqué.

During the period spanning from May to June of 1907, three new musical visions were premiered. All of them had been written by composers who had formerly collaborated with the Espectacles-Audicions Graner (and who would subsequently engage in further collaboration with the organization). These pieces were Mansuet (with music by Celestí Sadurní), La cova del mar [The sea's cave] and Vetlla d'amor [Love's soirée] (both with music by Narcisa Freixas).

Mansuet, written by Joan Molas Valverde (b. 1887), is also the name of a legendary character from Collbató (Baix Llobregat). According to the story, the blacksmith took the women and children of Collbató to the neighboring caves in the mountain of Montserrat to protect them from the French invasion during the Peninsular War (1808–1812). There, he installed an ammunition manufacture to provide soldiers with weapons, and he was able to scare away the French soldiers that tried to come in. This legend became increasingly popular during the 19th century and was among the main myths of Catalanism. It was staged at the Portfoliògraf hall in four scenes, with the stage sets designed by Fèlix Urgellès. The composer, Celestí Sadurní, had already conducted the seasons of Catalan Lyric Theater of 1901 and 1903 and was known in the field.

La cova del mar was presented as a "theatrical vision" by with text by Rafael Nogueras and music by Narcisa Freixas. This duo had recently written the musical drama Rodamon, which would be premiered at the Principal theater during the following season. Nogueras had also been a frequent collaborator at the Mercè hall, writing several musical visions for the 1906/07 season. As for La cova del mar, the press compares it to these productions at the Mercè hall and speaks of a high expense on the backdrops and visual production, but no details about its content is provided.

Vetlla d'amor presents a fishermen town by the sea, with two backdrops painted again by Fèlix Urgellès. The one for the second scene was especially highlighted by the critics for the exquisite way of painting light reflections on the sea. The text develops a sentimental conflict between the local inhabitants, portraying his popular customs, dialect and maritime traditions. As for the music, Narcisa Freixas wrote some musical illustrations, of which the press highlights a sailing song and a fishermen chorus. Apparently, this musical vision was liked better than other previous ones because it was less suggestive and presented a more intense dramatic conflict between the characters.

Tickets for the first one, made up of 4 scenes, were offered at 75 cents for preference entry and 40 cents for general admission. The following musical visions, of shorter duration, offered their tickets at 50 cents for preferred seating and 25 cents for general admission.

On July 4th, a "brief" hiatus in the performances was announced to facilitate the preparation of the titles of the new season. Some of them had already been disclosed, such as La dona catalana [The Catalan woman], which was reportedly being rehearsed. However, following Vetlla d'amor, there are no further news of the reopening of the aforementioned hall. At the commencement of the 1907/08 season, the actors of the musical visions that formed the Portfoliògraf company were integrated as new members of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner company in the Principal theater.

The abrupt closure of the Portfoliògraf hall may have been precipitated by the ordinances promulgated by the Barcelona City Council, enacted around the aforementioned dates, implemented in light of the potential hazards associated with fire. The ordinances regulated the allowed activities inside showrooms and culminated in the prohibition of theatrical performances within cinematography halls. These same policies eventually affected also Graner's Mercè hall, forbidding the staging of musical visions on its stage.

In this context, the case of the Frederic Soler hall merits particular attention. The success of the Mercè hall precipitated the emergence of analogous venues in Barcelona and other Catalan cities. These imitators offered cinematographic screenings for an equally reduced price, frequently accompanied by brief performances at the end of each movie session. The content shown was also designed to appeal to children or even include their participation on stage.

The inauguration of the Portfoliògraf hall coincided with the opening on December 22nd, 1906 of the Frederic Soler hall at 67 Ronda de Sant Pau, in front of the Escolapis school. The venue had a similar programming: film screenings, colored movies, short concerts... A parallel trajectory was followed when it ceased operations on November 2nd, 1907, a decision enacted by the governor's municipal ordinance.

> "In the Frederich Soler theater, in addition to other deficiencies, it was noted that the width of the rows of seats is not up to code, the projection booth of the cinematographic apparatus lacks the necessary protection, there are few exits, and the stage and rooms have been built in terrible conditions. In view of all this, the governor has ordered the closure of the premises[695]."

[695] El Diluvio 307 (03/11/1907), morning edition, p. 11 [originally in Spanish].

During the few months in which it was operational, the venue presented performances of children's lyric theater in Catalan. However, its repertoire comprised zarzuelas and comedic pieces, rather than musical visions. Nonetheless, the initiative directly emulated the model of the Mercè hall. Indeed, all the children who were members of the Frederich Soler company had joined it inspired by what they had seen on the stage of the Mercè hall directed by Lluís Graner.

> "[...] From a very young age, [Carme] Buixadós was an enthusiastic visitor to the Mercè theater, at the times when Graner used to present small theatrical performances (known as tableaux, musical visions, etc.). The future comedian was so attracted to these shows that she asked for permission to take part in them, even if only as an extra among the tiny performers. Once she obtained permission, she was able to fulfill her desire. And the intelligent ones who saw her work in these conditions recognized her true talent as a theatrical artist.
> At the age of fourteen, Buixadós made her debut as part of a children's company at the Frederic Soler hall, now defunct, which was located on the Ronda de Sant Pau and was nothing more than an imitation of the Mercè hall. [...][696]"

Both the Frederic Soler and the Portfoliògraf halls work as compelling examples of the attempts during the 1906/07 season to emulate and expand upon the successful recreational model pioneered by Lluís Graner in the Mercè hall, which subsequently gained widespread popularity throughout the city of Barcelona. However, these three promoters of the lyrical repertoire for children in Catalan language ultimately encountered the repercussions of the bureaucracy of the city council, which compelled the cessation of operations due to concerns regarding security.

Concurrently, there were also voices that expressed criticism about the perceived inequity in the competition with proper theaters that cinematographers engaged in by organizing live performances. Furthermore, there was also criticism directed towards child labor in venues that sought economic gain from the participation of infant boys and girls on stage, which led to its eventual prohibition. In some cases, certain voices on the press even claimed that security concerns had been the official excuse of the governor's office to close the venues promoting Catalan language in an anti-Catalanist act.

❖ Patronat de l'Obrer (Tarragona)

The influence of the Barcelona shows directed by Lluís Graner began to arrive in Tarragona in December 1906, firstly with the installation of a cinematographer that made it possible for the venue of the Patronat de l'Obrer [Patronage for the Workers] of Tarragona to be included in the film distribution network of the Mercè hall.

> "Patronage for the Workers has already acquired the apparatus to install a cinematographer in its spacious venue. We know from a very good source that the machines and equipment acquired are of the most modern that is known and that their installation is under the responsibility of the intelligent industrial Mr. Clanchet.
> Patronage for the Workers has reached an agreement with Mr. Graner and the films exhibited will be the same as in the Mercè hall in Barcelona. It seems that sessions will only be celebrated on Thursdays and Sundays[697]."

The spring season of 1907 (February-June) witnessed also the arrival of musical visions, promoted by the priest Jaume Bofarull (1873–1936), who also engaged as a literary author. For the current season, mainly titles that premiered at the Mercè hall were reprised at the theater of the Patronage for the Workers of Tarragona, a venue that had to be specifically adapted to the technical requirements of the genre regarding the electric lighting. The musical visions El mal rabadà, La mort de l'escolà and El bon escarceller, all three successful titles well known in the musical visions network, were staged in Tarragona between February and April of 1907. The cinematographic screenings, however, continued, and they were used as an accompaniment to the musical visions on joined sessions, which were organized on Sundays, comprising four per day.

The activity of the Patronage for the Workers did not remain confined to being a simple itineracy of the Mercè hall; rather, the initial reception sought to consolidate the genre and premiered new productions in an attempt to establish the musical vision genre in Tarragona. Towards the end of the season, on May 18th, the first original musical vision of Tarragona was released, with Bofarull as author of the text with music by the priest Eudald Serra. Lo pastor i el rei [The shepherd and the king], "popular tale arranged to the scene", is set in two scenes and depicts the conflict between religious and earthly power.

The first scene takes place in a Gothic cloister with a garden and the religious chants heard. The shepherd, who's the main character of the story comes into the garden singing how happy he is living surrounded by nature in the mountains with the sheep while the monks keep singing. Once they finish, the monks cross the stage through the background while the shepherd explains the conflict between the abbot and the king, who has threatened to close the monastery, as if it was an epic poem. Horns and trumpets are heard announcing the arrival of the king while the scene arrives to an end.

The second scene is set in one of the lateral naves of the cloisters, with the shepherd dressed as the abbot. It's night and the moon shines illuminating the scene. The shine of the weapons from the soldier is often seen while they approach the scene. Once the king arrives, the shepherd manages to solve the riddles he asks, therefore winning the deal and saving the monastery from his invasion. He proves that innocence and faith from a shepherd and some monks can prove smarter than the tricks of a powerful king.

The religious world, therefore, is linked to the peace of nature and the mountains, the side that the rural world should stand by to preserve their spiritual pureness, while the earthly power of the king is presented as tricky, unfair and linked to war. The moral teaching is clear.

As well, elements such as the archaic literary form of the epic poem used by the shepherd connect with historicist folklore, reminding of the musical vision El bon escarceller, original from the Mercè hall, that had also been recently staged in Tarragona. In both, the epic poem is used to present to the audience the back story that led to the present situation, instead of performing the precedents on stage.

Plastically, the piece symbolically presents the contrast between the calmness of the initial scene, embedded in sounds of nature, religious chants and pure happiness in connection with the nature, and the arrival of the king with his disrupting trumpets, sounds of weapons coming back from the hunt and their irregular shining against the clear moonlight.

Lo pastor i el rei received substantial support from both local critics and the religious press. This endorsement was manifested in the form of encouragement to settle the genre of "suggestive plastic tableaux", or musical visions, to the city of Tarragona:

> "The shepherd and the king. That's how the literary-musical piece by Mn. Jaume Bofarull and Mn. Eudald Serra is called, the first manifestation of a new theatrical genre in Tarragona.
> Embezzled with the currents of modern dramatic literature, supersaturated with the too strong and repeated impressions of the dominant scenic genres, this new dramatic form that the musical vision constitutes, inspired by the unexplored field of the legend, has come to refresh the tired imagination in some centers of artistic culture and to soften the tension of our nervous system.
>
> On the other hand, nothing matches better the spirit of modern musical drama than this display of apparent simplicity, of inner action, of the absence of all conventional elements in theater than this new form of stage production, which the intelligent business artist of Barcelona, Don Lluís Graner, has rightly begun to popularize. It comes to be a happy conjunction of the idea who has inspired the true musical drama with a trial of scenic impressionism well performed.
> We summarize in two words the impression of the work premiered on Sunday in the showroom of the Patronage for the Workers. It is well worth it —and much more than anything I could say—the interest shown by the organizers in providing Tarragona with a very cultured show, presented with the cooperation of all the necessary elements. […]

Emili Vallès[698]"

Besides this first title, the Patronage for the Workers published at least two more librettos of musical visions written by the same Jaume Bofarull, which were supposed to be scheduled for the following season (1907/08)[699]. Furthermore, the back cover of the publications contained an announcement regarding a series of "premieres in preparation for the new season". Among the titles quoted, there are: Lo pirata contrit, a dramatic piece in two scenes; La vetlla dels pastors, an idyll in two parts; Lo cornamussaire, a lyrical piece in two scenes; L'Àngelus, a vision of nature in three parts; and Fra Margenet, a legend from Poblet in two scenes. In essence, they were planning to establish a permanent exhibition of musical visions in Tarragona, featuring a series of newly created musical plastic tableaux.

However, the Patronage for the Workers' theater did not commence the season because the building began its renovation under the direction of the architect Josep Maria Jujol, former pupil of Antoni Gaudí. The construction works were carried out from 1908 to 1910, and the project of musical visions of Tarragona was temporarily suspended.

Following the renovation of the theater, the nowadays known as Metropol theater (located at 46 Rambla Nova, Tarragona) resumed its activity at the beginning of January 1910. The renovation included the electrification in the theater, which involved the integration of lighting on the facade and light effects on the stage. The modernist style of the theater makes the building resemble the shape of a ship, with an according design for the interior[700].

The performances for the new season were scheduled on Saturdays and holidays, with four to five sessions per day. The musical accompaniment was provided by the string quintet of Mr. Roig, while the actors were drawn from the Catholic-Lyrical-Dramatic Company of the Patronage for the Workers.

The inaugural productions that were premiered on the newly constructed stage were, actually, the musical visions by Jaume Bofarull that had been published in 1907 and left unperformed because of the temporary closure of the venue. The Tarragonian rendition of La presó de Lleida [Lleida's prison], accompanied by a composition by Daniel Mestres that adapted the widely recognized song bearing the same title, and Lo salamonet de les matines [The light shaft of the morning prayers], featuring a musical score by Francesc Salvat (who had also composed music for the 1907/08 season of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner), were brought back to the programming to reopen the theater. Additionally, a reprise of El mal rabadà was briefly restaged, a piece previously performed in February 1907 coming from the Mercè hall.

La presó de Lleida, "folk song adapted for the stage", follows the homonymous folk song. It stages the same plot that the song narrates, and the music should have been also a gloss of the corresponding folk melody. The song tells a story about the Baron in Lleida, whose daughter falls in love with one of the prisoners her father keeps arrested. She asks for mercy, but he severely sticks to his opinion and sentence her loved one to death. After that, she takes her life too and the Baron learns that sometimes mercy is a worthier option.

The same song had already been staged as a musical vision at the Principal theater of Barcelona authored by Adrià Gual and Jaume Pahissa. Bofarull's version, although taking the same song as the core of the piece, presents a different dramaturgy. To start with, Bofarull's vision is shorter, written only in two scenes, while Gual's version had five. While Gual's version was focused on the emotional relation between the Baron's daughter and her beloved prisoner, the cause of the grief that takes her to commit suicide, Bofarull's version pays more attention to the dilemma held by the Baron. He had been a secondary character in the first version and now becomes the main one.

The piece staged in Tarragona is less sentimental and more leaned towards the pedagogical learning that one's acts have to be repaid and that justice must be done even if it's cruel and goes against our feelings, as exposed in a long internal monologue in verse by the Baron in the first scene. The second scene starts when the hanging has just taken place and the people are still cheering on, although it's not seen on stage. The daughter sings out her grief, but the Baron appears to say that despite the heartbreak she causes him, the lands those criminals burnt are still smokey. As the last intervention that closes the piece, she asks him not to speak to her again, revealing that her lover was between the hanged prisoners.

In Gual's version, the hanging scene was completely omitted, and from the Baron signing the sentence to death, the action moves to the gallows with both deaths already committed. This way, the focus is uniquely put on the emotion felt on each scene, with as little action as possible taking place. Bofarull, instead, focuses on the punishment of crimes and how justice should be above pity. He avoids the suicide scene (an act that, keeping in mind that Bofarull was a priest, would have been considered sinful), minimizing the sentimental aspect of the story that places love above justice.

In terms of musical moments, the piece includes a prisoners' chorus in the first scene, which is heard begging Margarida, the daughter, for mercy and to convince her dad. The chorus is reprised in multiple moments insisting on Margarida, although the prisoners are not seen on stage, and Margarida's beloved one does not intervene individually, while, in Gual's version, he does. The second scene starts with a soldiers' chorus, followed by Margarida's lament. It seems that the folk song melody recalling the original lyrics is not heard until the very end, when, after her lament, Margarida continues singing to the Baron confessing that she loved one of the prisoners. However, the score has not been located to properly analyze the treatment of the folk song and its motifs throughout the piece.

Visually, the light is used symbolically to portray the sunset and the end of the day, as the lives of the prisoners are also arriving to an end, and as darkness is setting in between the Baron and his daughter. The first scene takes place during the evening with a sunsetting light, while the second one takes place at night, illuminated by the moon. The moonlight, shining between the clouds, should dramatically illuminate the hanged people that are seen on the background above the wall.

The following musical vision, Lo salamonet de les matines, presents a maritime scene in which sailors are the main characters, portraying the ambience of sea life as other musical visions like La lluerna or Vetlla d'amor did. Bofarull wrote the piece in two scenes. The first one portrays the rocky seaside after a heavy storm, once the sky is already calm again and the rainbow is shining. A boat has just been rescued, and the sailors are meeting each other checking that they are all well and thanking God for their fortune. The scene has multiple singing moments by the master of the boat and his daughter that wants to become a nun to thank God for their rescue. In the second scene, the master and his young helper are inside his sailor's cabin, cooking to celebrate with the family their safe arrival. While they prepare the food, the sailor explains to his helper the story of how he saw in the middle of the storm the light shaft of the church, lit by the priests during the morning prayers, and that's what helped him to find the shore and save the crew.

The story is based on a folk legend from Tarragona. As well, the stage setting is used to portray the traditional way of life of the sailors, the interior of their houses, their aspects and the sailing utensils. Both popular and folk elements are characteristic of the genre of musical visions, as well as the religious one. The light shaft from the church clearly symbolizes how God's light can save you in moments of darkness.

The piece presents very little action on stage. Actually, both scenes take place after the action has occurred. The first one focuses on portraying on stage the joy after their salvation and how thankful they feel to God, reinforced by the calmness of the sky, the rainbow and their singing, in contrast with the destroyed ship on stage as a sign of what has happened. The second one is used to explain the events from the sailor's house, familiarizing the audience with the legendary story, but the action itself that is contained in the legend is not performed on stage. This aligns with the characteristics of the genre's dramaturgy, which, according to Symbolist aesthetics, focuses on the suggestion of emotional states rather than in the performance of dramatic action on stage.

Despite this, after these pending titles were finally staged, the theater did not maintain the programming of musical visions, and instead featured a variety of musical shows, clowns, and spoken theater performances.

❖ Saló Montserrat (Arenys de Mar)

The Saló Montserrat, or Montserrat hall, was inaugurated in July 1907 as an independent company installed within the Catholic Center of Arenys de Mar. The name of Montserrat comes from the homonymous "magical mountain" where one of the most symbolic chapels for the Catalan church is located, linking Catholicism and Catalan mythology in one place. The design of the hall, which primarily functioned as a venue for cinematographic projection, was designed by Marià Castells (1876–1931).

> "Attention is drawn to some stained glasses in which the films are advertised. They are the work of our dear friend, the distinguished and lauded artist Mariano Castells. Among them stands out one that symbolizes Solidarity[701] with the emblems of the parties that comprise it. It has earned everyone's appreciation[702]."

The first performances of musical visions took place at the Montserrat hall in December of 1907. The program's primary contributors were Xavier Maimí, who worked as composer and pianist, and Joan Draper, who, besides writing the librettos, also assumed responsibility for media relations communicating the programming to the press.

Francesc Xavier Maimí i Miró (1888–1965), known simply as Xavier Maimí, was primarily recognized as a composer of religious music, hymns, motets, songs, and joys. He worked as the director of the girls' choir of the parish of Santa Maria and is best known for his instrumental role in the recovery of La dansa d'Arenys or The Dance of Arenys, a project that first began in 1916 and concluded in 1949.

Under his direction, the troupe Maragall resumed the performance of the dance for the Festa Major celebrations. Since that time, the dance has been a staple of the events surrounding the festivities of Saint Roc, which is celebrated on August 16th[703].

Maimí, however, was professionally engaged in commerce and managed Can Maimí, a well-known establishment located at number 40 of the Riera del Bisbe Pol, which specialized in pottery items[704].

Joan Draper i Fossas (1889–1970) distinguished himself in the field of poetry and assumed the role of an activist, defending Catalan nationalism through a variety of journalistic media. He founded the newspaper L'Avenir in 1907 in Arenys. In addition to this, he was part of the editorial staff of La Costa de Llevant and a contributor to La Veu de Catalunya and El Correu Català, among others[705].

In the realm of theatrical production, extending beyond the musical visions of the Montserrat hall, he made his debut in the theater of the Regionalist Center of Arenys with the dramatic tale L'amor sempre triomfa [Love always triumphs] (1915). Later on, he published the lyric comedy in three acts La posada de l'amor [Love's inn] (1925) in collaboration with Prudenci Bertrana. Partnered with Xavier Maimí, he also composed the anthem dedicated to Saint Zenon, a noteworthy contribution to the popular tradition of Arenys de Mar[706].

The musical part in the Montserrat hall was executed by the quartet La Santa Espina (a deliberate allusion to the lyric drama by Guimerà and Morera that had recently premiered at the Principal theater in Barcelona). From its members, it is known that Josep Mensa i Fàbregas was one of the musicians, who later on would also compose the music for one of the musical visions that had its premiere in the hall.

The musical visions, which were all original compositions, were presented in the form of children's plays. Therefore, the dramatic interpretation was executed mainly by children and young students, as well as affiliates of the Catholic center. The following individuals were involved: the girls Cristina Fors, Crusat, and Buxadé; the boys Joan Fors, Felip Buxadé, Joaquim Estengre, and Joan Bosch; and the youngsters Llàtzer Mayola, Vicenç Buxadé, Joan Baranger, and Salvador Daniel. Some of them, sharing last names, were reportedly siblings.

The commencement of theatrical activities in Montserrat hall occurred in the immediate aftermath of the prohibition of live performances inside cinema halls in Barcelona, which resulted in the halting of musical visions at the Mercè hall. Actually, the initial works referenced or parodied productions from Barcelona: En Tonet i la Guideta [Little Ton and little Guida] presented a comedic version of the opera Ton i Guida [the translation of Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel], shown at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Additionally, Nit de reis [The Three Kings Night] and L'home de la pell de l'os [The Man with the Bear's Skin] were alluding to the titles premiered by Apel·les Mestres and Enric Morera at the Principal theater, also as repertoire of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Furthermore, the vision El palau del gegantàs [The Giant's Palace] could also be related to the plastic installation on the underground floor of the Mercè hall that had been very recently shown about the same topic.

A later reference, published in the Antologia d'autors catalans by Antoni Ollé i Bertran, indicates that Joan Draper and Xavier Maimí, the main promoters of musical visions in the Montserrat hall, premiered their lyric plastic tableaux at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner[707]. Considering that they did not premiere any pieces at the Principal theater, the residence of the company, this could point to the direct relationship or involvement between the project in Barcelona led by Graner and the Montserrat hall.

The first two productions, with text by Francisco de Prats, reused music by other composers. Humperdinck's parody used fragments of the music from the original opera, and Nit de reis used fragments of musical compositions by Eduard Schütt. The following musical visions included original music, in most of the cases written by Francesc Xavier Maimí. El palau del gegantàs and L'home de la pell de l'os were the first productions presented by the duo Draper-Maimí. These were followed by El príncep qui s'és enamorat [The prince who's fallen in love], which received a wider review on the press.

El príncep qui s'és enamorat was premiered on March 25th, 1908. According to the reviews, the musical vision presents a prince that, during one of his hunting trips, falls on the woods and is rescued and healed by a local villager. The prince falls in love with her and, when the courtesans arrive looking for him, he declares they'll get married. The scene is finished with a hunting song. The second scene starts with the king waiting for the news on his son, while maids are singing to keep him entertained and the court clown is also performing his show for him. Eventually, the son arrives and convince his father to accept the wedding, concluding in a happy ending, because, as the traditional Catalan saying goes, “a little girl is worth a king”. This musical vision, then, as we can also assume for many of the previous ones, falls rather on the subgenre of popular tales for children, presenting a rather narrative evolution of the plot, but following the aesthetics of children’s tales based on kings, princesses and fantastic events in nature.

The following collaboration between Draper and Maimí was La fada del bosc [The fairy from the woods]. Set again in the woods, this time two brothers will be having a stroll. One of them is a good boy, while the other is bothering the birds and misbehaving. When they meet an old lady, only one of them accepts helping her carry her bags. The lady turns out to be a fairy that rewards the good boy with almonds from Arenys and punishes the other, although, eventually, she withdraws the punishment since wickedness is not a good trait. Following the line of fantastic tales, in this case the moral learning aimed at the kids from the audience is clear.

Their last collaboration, however, moves towards comic operetta. El rei filharmònic [The philharmonic king]. A king that loves music is set to look for a singer to marry his daughter. From the candidates, he admires a great Italian singer with a deep voice, but quite an ugly face that the princess denies marrying. Instead, she likes a young and handsome boy, also Italian, that is rather haughty and not as good singer, but who is young and handsome. Eventually, the father desists and allows her to follow her wish. The comicalness of the piece would have been mostly based on mocking Italian stereotypes and accent, as well as the music.

Lastly, it’s worth mentioning the collaboration of Josep Granger with the Montserrat hall. He wrote La temptació [The temptation], for which Josep Maria Padró wrote the music, and La fantasma del rec [The ghost from the stream] with music by Josep Maria Padró. The second one is mainly, again, a moral teaching for children. In the first scene, a group of kids skip school to go bother the birds in the forest, when one of them claims he’s seen a ghost in the surroundings. In the second scene, the kids find the ghost by the stream on a gloomy area of the woods. She scares them out and teaches them not to bother the animals anymore.

For most productions of the season, Marià Castells i Simó was the painter in charge of the stage designs, often produced with the help of Emili Lloret[708]. Castells was a renowned artist from Arenys de Mar, one of the main local representants of Art Nouveau in the municipality, and he also designed the glass billboards used at the Montserrat hall to announce the program of movies to be screened, which included the shield of the political coalition Solidaritat Catalana and the parties that formed it[709].

The company of the Montserrat hall programmed musical visions only during the 1907/08 season, from December 1907 to July 1908. The performances were scheduled exclusively on Sundays, during the night sessions. Typically, pieces were staged only a single day, with select exceptions, like En Tonet i la Guideta or El palau del gegantàs, where performances were subsequently reprised. For the following season, the hall exclusively presented cinematographic screenings.

It is also worth noting that, meanwhile, in the municipality of Arenys de Mar, a newly constructed "Sala Mercè" was inaugurated. Emulating the renowned hall from Barcelona, it sought to capitalize on its success eventually becoming a commercial cinema. Although Lluís Graner initially provided support for the installation of this new hall, after their deviation from the original moral line of programming, he petitioned the pertinent ministry for the exclusivity of the name "Sala Mercè". His intention was to forestall the multiplication of Mercè halls, which was eventually approved by the ministry[710].

❖ Centre Catòlic (Olot)

The musical visions reached the Catholic Center of Olot, an institution with a long tradition of amateur theater, under the promotion of Antoni Doltra i Masferrer (1880–1936). On May 16th, 1908, Doltra was appointed vicar of Olot. Since his arrival, he composed multiple musical visions to become part of the repertoire of the dramatic and choral sections of the center.

The earliest documented musical vision, however, was L'oració de la nit, which was already well-known in Girona as the piece that Rafael Masó used to inaugurate the Gerió hall. It is worth reminding that the Gerió hall was another initiative dedicated to the staging of musical visions that was also housed in a religious center, the Moral Center of Girona. The performance also featured Esclavitud i redempció [Slavery and redemption] by Carles Badia i Malagrida, which had previously been premiered at the Escoles Pies religious school in Olot. Additionally, Doltra's inaugural musical vision, titled Nit de reis, was presented on the Day of the Three Wise Men in 1906, a fitting selection for the event.

Among the members involved in the venue, Antoni Doltra stands out as both the primary writer and the principal promoter of the project. During this period, a significant collaboration emerged between Doltra and Sanxo-Marraco, particularly notable for Sanxo-Marraco's musical compositions into the poetic works of the aforementioned writer. This artistic partnership is further significant as Marraco had previously composed music for the Espectacles-Audicions Graner in Barcelona.

Other members that have been identified are Josep Rufet i Rosa (1870–1934), the organist of the parish, who was responsible for writing the music for Doltra's pieces; Mr. Corriols, who worked as the pianist during the performances; Mr. Morer, who assumed the role of stage director; and Mr. R. Jutglar, Mr. Y. Coromina, Mr. Nogué, Mr. Casas, Mr. Vinyet, and little Corbatón, who took on the role of actors.

Nit de reis follows the traditional topic of the Three Wise Men, who bring presents to the kids on the night of January 5th. Doltra's version presents a little kid's room on that evening, waiting for them to come. It's a short scene that contrasts the kid's innocence with his father's grieve, since the mother died last year and, in their poor economy, the family can't afford gifts for the kid. The little boy watches his friends through his window going to the center with candle lights to sing together for the arrival of the Three Wise Men.

The piece introduces verisimilar musical parts as incidental music when the kids sing together on the street and when the night watchman passes by the window. After praying in the name of his passed mother to his guardian angel, it appears in his room bringing him the toys he deserves for being a faithful boy. The prayer and the angel's appearance are in verse and could also had ben sung or recited over instrumental music, following the examples of other musical visions known by Doltra, as L'oració de la nit.

Visually, the scene doesn't move from the kid's bedroom, but variations are introduced through changed in the lighting: when it comes from outside while the rest of kids pass by with lanterns on their hands, when the father leaves and lets the boy to sleep with the light off, and when the angel appears, probably with a strike of white light as in other musical visions.

Els fills de Jacob [Jacob's children] is based on the children of Jacob, the biblical character, and follows the story of Joseph as it's originally portrayed on the sacred books. The piece starts with a scene in the middle of the nature and the kids surrounding a fire they're using to cook. All together, they sing a prayer to thank God before starting to eat. However, when Joseph arrives and starts telling the dreams he had, his special quality through which God revealed the future to him, Simeó tries to kill him with a knife. Instead, they hold him captive to sell him as a slave.

The second scene, in Joseph's prison, starts with instrumental music while he wakes up, missing the light of the day and the stars. He then sings expressing his sadness and asking God for mercy. The following scene is set at the Pharaon's court, starting with a musical number with a chorus of fortune tellers. Joseph is called to interpretate the Pharaon's dreams and, as he does, he is granted freedom.

A forth scene is set on the street, where people sing wishing glory to Joseph, the new vice-king of Egypt. The final scene takes place in Joseph's palace, where his brothers arrive asking to buy grain, not recognizing him. Joseph sings thanking God for keeping his father and siblings alive and healthy and they all sing together a chorus at the end happy to be reunited and forgetting the past resentments.

Despite the large number of scenes, they are short in duration, keeping the musical vision within the usual short format. The piece has a clear pedagogical intention to familiarize the audience with the biblical story and characters. Its dramaturgy is focused, as characteristic of the musical visions, on portraying multiple visual scenes that resulted attractive to the eyes, accompanied each by music that would help set the audience in the right emotional state. The short five scenes portray a forest, a prison, a palace, the Egyptian court… Multiple and spectacular stage sets that provide lots of images to understand the story through the eyes, to visualize the story heard from the priest, and recreate the emotions of the characters through music, rather than explaining the intricate plot of events through the development of a dramatic action.

El pont del diable [Devil's bridge] is a based, instead, on a Catalan folk legend. Although there are around 80 bridges in Catalonia carrying that name, whose origins are related to myths involving the intervention of the devil, the one Doltra's play refers to is, most likely, the one in La Garrotxa, Northeast of Olot. Doltra's musical vision starts with a rainy night, charged of sound effects and music. After the intermediate backdrop picturing a church is lifted as the man walking moves on, the river is shown, with a town at the other side. The main character needs to cross it to arrive to the fair at the other side and sell there his animals. His wish for money even leads him to say he'd sell his soul to the devil if he built the bridge he needed.

The devil accepts to do so, but the deal is that it has to be fully finished by midnight. The devil and his little demons sing about the eternity in hell that the character will suffer, but eventually, they are missing one stone. The character's friend has it in his hand by the church seen at the beginning, and the sign of the cross he does in name of the Virgin protects him from the devil until the bell marks that midnight has arrived. The deal was not fulfilled and they sing thanking the Virgin for his salvation.

This musical vision fits with the genre of staged legends, this time also with an implicit religious connotation. The typical imagery of the musical visions is seen here, including the demons as evil creatures from hell, the church as symbol of protecting Catholicism, and the nature in a wild state that allows for spectacular visual and sound effects to portray the storm. Musically, the contrast between the devils chorus and the final mercy sang to the Virgin would have also marked that contrast between dissonant and rhythmically irregular music against harmonic and homorythmic chants.

Following the release of Nit de reis, Els fills de Jacob and El pont del diable, which drew inspiration from biblical episodes and local legends, the Catholic Center inaugurated a religious cinematographer known as Cine-Colón in February 1911. One of the last pieces by Doltra staged in Olot was El barranc maleït [The cursed cliff], a dramatic episode in three scenes written for the Traditionalist Youth association. It was scheduled to premiere on February 4th, 1912, but the first performance was suspended, and the premiere was moved to June 29th. The three scenes (1st, The Red Week in the Ciutadella's Park; 2nd, By the Wolf's Cliff; 3rd, On the way to Gurugú) were intended to portray the Tragic Week and the Rif War[711].

Following the reprise of L'oració de la nit in March 1912, Doltra was relocated to Cruïlles and that halted the development of new musical visions. On August 19th, 1913, he assumed the role of rector in Cruïlles. Nonetheless, he debuted there the musical vision of Sant Diumenge [Holy Sunday], which is centered on the celebration of Palm Sunday.

This event took place at the Patronat de Sant Pere Màrtir on Palm Sunday of 1915. The musical part, composed by Rufet, suggests that the composition was written during his previous residency in Olot.

A compendium of his musical visions was published in 1925 in a compilation edited in Olot by the bookshop of Ramon Bonet. It appears that this initiative may have further motivated Doltra to compose a subsequent musical work.

In June of 1926, the poem that would eventually become La cançó dels romeus [The song of the Pilgrims] of La Verge Miraclera [The Miraculous Virgin] was published. The complete vision was premiered in December of that same year at the Catholic Center of Olot. The production was staged by the Immaculada and Sant Antoni Board of Female Workers, at a time when Doltra was rector of Sant Cristòfol les Fonts.

Other extraordinarily premiered titles

The vast majority of documented musical visions were performed within the programming of halls, theaters or seasons dedicated specifically to this repertoire. However, there were also some musical visions that were extraordinarily premiered in other contexts, as part of heterogeneous programs. This section is devoted to titles that were initially presented in unconventional settings, such as schools or recreational halls, which were not exclusively dedicated to this particular repertoire. Furthermore, additional titles are identified because some of either their literary or musical texts have survived. However, there is an absence of any evidence suggesting their eventual performance on stage or any association with a specific scenic company that commissioned them. Consequently, these titles have been omitted from the previous chapters.

Among the titles compiled, it is noteworthy to mention that some were related to the institutionalized network dedicated to musical visions. Notable examples are El boig [The crazy one] and Tristos gitanos [Sad gypsies], which premiered at the Teatro del Retiro in Terrassa in early 1909. These productions can be regarded as a kind of epilogue to the genre in the city, following the closure of the Ars-Lucis room the previous year.

El boig, with music by Joan Llongueras one of the main promoters of the Ars-Lucis hall and text by Joan Solà Mestres was a musical vision premiered on January 23rd, 1909. The piece depicted the Peninsular War, in which context a Catalan town uprises against the French invaders and plans a mass execution at night. The protagonist "crazy one" of the story is the only one in town that claims for a peaceful humanitarian solution, stopping the aggression.

As for Els tristos gitanos, the piece shares a humanitarian claim regarding the gypsy community and the events that had recently taken place in Terrassa resulting in a bill to expel the gypsies from the municipality. Written by Pere Salom, with music by Josep Gasset and set design by J. Domingo, the piece was premiered on February 2nd, 1909. In a single scene, this vision depicts a caravan of traveller gypsies that deliver a poetic speech about their itinerant situation, eventually leaving the scene on the continuation of their journey. As for the music, it was reportedly accompanied by piano and violins.

Another piece was that somehow related to the network of musical visions was El cavaller de Faras [The knight of Farras]. This title is documented in 1911, at least under rehearsal by the Orfeó Gironí, who had maintained a collaboration with the Saló Gerió during its active years. The founder of the Orfeó, Isidre Mollera, had previously worked as the conductor of the musical ensemble of the Saló Gerió, which closed in 1909.

Joan Fargas was another author related to the network of musical visions. He wrote the music for the Moisès premiered in 1907 at the Mercè hall, and for the Griselda premiered in 1909 at the Traditionalist Youth of Sarrià that later on was reprised at the Sala Imperi in 1911. Both had lyrics by Lluís Viladot, his usual collaborator, and were based, the first one on the biblical episode of the homonymous character, and the second one on a medieval legend. His personal archive preserved at the church of Santa Maria in Mataró includes the scores of two more musical visions, continuing the collaboration with Lluís Viladot. These titles are Los reis [The kings], based on the popular Christmas topic of the Three Wise Men, and La tornada del fill pròdig [The return of the prodigal son], based on the Catholic parable. Each piece was divided into two scenes and was written for two or three voices accompanied by piano. There are, however, no notes on the documents indicating their staging and no reports have been found in the press.

It is also worth remarking that the district of Sarrià, where Fargas's Griselda was premiered, also saw at least two more musical visions that were premiered at the Sant Josep school. El clam del castell encantat, a "legendary, phantastic and magical vision", was staged in July 1909, by the end of the school year. The lyrics were written by Pere Bosch Ferran, and the music was composed by Jaume Bofarull, the same priest that had promoted the genre of musical visions in the Patronat de l'Obrer in Tarragona.

Apparently, on that same month, Pere Bosch left another musical vision written down, El somni de l'àngel [The angel's dream], which received an award at the literary Jocs Florals of Sants in October 1909. However, no report has been found about the staging of this "lyric-dramatic vision" in three scenes, with music by Miquel Casas Aragonés, until the beginning of October 1911 at the same Sant Josep school in Sarrià. As written in the manuscript, the piece was inspired by The assumption of Hannele (1893) by Gerhart Hauptmann. It included choral numbers sung by little angels accompanied by a harmonium.

Lo captiveri d'un sant [A saint's captivity], which premiered in 1912 at the Casa de la Caritat in Barcelona, was composed by Joan Baptista Lambert, former pianist of the Sala Mercè and conductor of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner orchestra, who had previously written multiple musical visions under the artistic direction of Lluís Graner. This new vision was composed to inaugurate the new auditorium of the House of Charity, which was the residence of a choral ensemble led by Lambert.

This "lyric-dramatic vision" divided in two scenes was written by G. Puig, priest of the same House of Charity, and the stage set was designed by Oleguer Junyent. The piece is based on the story of the medieval saint Vicenç de Paul, hosted prisoner by Muslim pirates. Only the score has been preserved at the personal archive of Joan B. Lambert at the Orfeó Català archive, which includes six musical numbers for full orchestra, one of them the gloss of a Catalan folk song.

La creu [The cross] was the title for another musical vision premiered by the youth association of the Lliga d'Acció Social of Figueres in April 1909. During the previous season, the same group had also performed under the musical conducting of Pere Codina the musical visions La pastoreta [The little shepherd girl] and A la voreta del mar [By the sea], originally premiered at the Mercè hall.

The name of Il·luminat Saperas also stands out as a composer interested on approaching the genre. He wrote the music for Lo pastoret i la papallona [The little shepherd and the butterfly] and La mort del rossinyol [The death of the nightingale]. Thes pieces were premiered, respectively, on June 21st, 1908 at the Ateneu Obrer del Districte II (which had previously staged Sant Ramon, original from the Mercè hall) and on January 12th, 1919 at the theater of the Ateneu of Igualada. While Lo pastoret i la papallona, written by Constantí Vidal, probably presented a bucolic and pastoral scene, La mort del rossinyol was an arrangement of Jacint Verdaguer's homonymous poem made by Joan Gois, with music played by a sextet and a new backcloth accompanied by special light effects.

One last musical vision worth remarking is La visió del frare Lleonart o Els reis d'Orient [The vision of friar Leonard or The Three Kings from the East], written in two scenes by Ramon Pàmies (1874–1918) with music by Pere Solé Balcells. The piece is slightly based on the recurrent Christmas topic of the Three Wise Men and its text was published at the L'Escon collection of children's pieces in 1911. It has only been documented on stage at the Catholic Centre of Blanes during the Christmas season of 1916/17, played by their young amateur troupe.

The narrative focuses on friar Lleonart, who experiences spiritual uncertainty during the Three Wise Men night and struggles to keep bad feelings out of his heart. He is challenged with maintaining revengeful thoughts out of his mind, until the three kings from the East —along with Jesus— appear before him, offering guidance and assistance to redirect his course toward righteousness.

Some other reported musical visions —of which not much more than only the title is known— are Desterrat [Exiled], with music and lyrics by Franscisco Costa, premiered at the Foment de l'Ensanxe of Barcelona on December 15th, 1906; Los abanicos [The fans], with music by Mr. Blay and set design for the three scenes by Miquel Moragas and Salvador Alarma, premiered on July 6th, 1907 at the Poliorama theater in Barcelona; or Catalunya [Catalonia], with lyrics by Dolors Trullol and music by Josep Maria de Macià, premiered on November 22nd, 1922 in Peralada.

Epilogue: And what happens next? Imprint and legacy of musical visions on later theater

After the closure of Baldomer Marinel·lo's enterprise at the Sala Imperi in early 1912, which was the last official company dedicated to the active promotion of musical visions, the network of venues that had been extended throughout Catalonia during the 1900s was completely deactivated. The genre of musical visions was left aside, and other lyric initiatives took the lead of the Catalan lyric theater movement once Graner emigrated.

However, the genre left a notable mark among the authors involved and, especially, among the ideological sectors keen on Graner's views. Catholic authors and playwrights of children's theater followed the steps left by the musical visions, which were one of the peak points in the production of a repertoire of Catalan theater especially dedicated to children, providing moral content and pedagogical lessons, based on fairytale and folk-like stories.

Among Catholic amateur theater groups, plenty of lyric pieces were premiered that continued the legacy left by the musical visions, which can even be appreciated in the terminology used to name the genre. During the 1920s and 1930s, a repertoire of "poetic visions" was written for child audiences, mostly based on religious teachings and fantastic medieval settings, including the miraculous "vision" or appearance of a fantastic character. The imagery based on medieval folk elements, religious references and characters and little demons was very similar to that of musical visions.

As well, the term "quadro plàstic" or "plastic tableaux" continued in use in the Catholic theater tradition for the following decades. The performance of short scenes, with little dialogue, still actions and the use of music and light to create emotional ambiences, characteristic of musical visions, continued in use under the label "plastic tableau".

The Catholic amateur tradition of theater, especially the children's repertoire, kept the genre alive during the 1920s, 30s and 50s, creating multiple titles that presented on stage live images from the life of Jesus, the appearance of saints or girls playing the Mother of God, accompanied by chants and light effects creating the effect of miraculous appearances. Cities like Olot, Figueres and Vic were the centers were most of these titles have been documented.

❖ “Poetic visions” from the 1920s and 1930s

During the 1920s and 1930s, a series of works were published under the category of “visions poemàtiques” or “poetic visions”. Although the given name suggests a possible link to the preexisting genre of musical visions (which usually used alternative names such as “visions of nature”, “crepuscular visions” or “dramatic visions”), there is no direct confirmation of this influence. Some characteristics are shared between both, but the general aesthetics of the documented pieces differed from the original Symbolist musical visions.

The poetic visions were short theatrical pieces that included musical numbers, often dramaturgically inserted as verisimilar music within the action. The pieces were published in collections of children’s theater, remarking their pedagogical intentions and their non-professional nature, destined to be played by amateur ensembles. The topics for the plots were predominantly religious, but they also included some folk-like tales in medievalized settings. Therefore, the form and the dramaturgical imagery coincide with the previous musical visions.

However, the pieces did not follow the Maeterlinck-inspired Symbolist dramaturgy, characterized by the suggestion of feelings and evocation of emotions through the creation of specific ambiences using multisensorial means. Instead, the poetic visions developed a short dramatic action, usually with a moral teaching at the end based on the lesson learned when resolving the dramatic conflict.

These were newly invented stories instead of glosses of pre-existing folklore. The term “vision”, which in “musical visions” meant the visual materialization of oral folklore, is used now to announce the miraculous appearance of a fantastic character during the play. Therefore, they were often realistic plays that included usually by the end the fantastic appearance or “vision” of a mystic character.

Most preeminently, the content for these poetic visions was religious. El somni d’un àngel [An angel’s dream] was published in 1920 as a vision with musical illustrations, written by Ricard Forga i Clarà, with music by Pere Picó. It had been premiered in May of that same year at the Centre for Social Popular Culture of the Conception Parish of Barcelona. The piece takes place in a village from the Catalan coast, in an ambience of fishermen. A little boy is waiting for the Three Wise Men and his grandfather tells him the story of the hermit that, on that same day many years ago, saved the fishermen whose boat sank during a storm, including his own father. The doctor arrives then to see the boy’s sister, who is very sick. While the kids share a childish illusion on the coming Wise Men, the adults are praying for the girl’s recovery.

The second scene takes place at the beach during the same night, where the village children are sleeping waiting for the Wise Men to arrive on a boat. Then, in the middle of the darkness, the figure of Jesus appears as a mystic vision. The doors of the hermitage open up while angels come out with gifts for the children following Jesus's orders. The children ask him for weapons to play with, and Jesus teaches them a lesson of peace, that love for the land should end any war, while angels come out with Catalan flags for the children. All the boys and girls sing and happily dance a folk sardana while the sun rises thanking Jesus for the miracle.

Therefore, the piece presents a folk ambience, like other musical visions like La lluerna or Lo salamonet de les matines, which focused on fishermen tradition and rescues from the sea mixed with the intervention of religious elements, while also bringing up a moral teaching. Its imagery and its pedagogical purpose stay aligned with the previous repertoire of musical visions.

El prodigi de Lourdes [The prodigy of Lourdes] was a poetic vision in one act written by priest Agustí Burgas. It was premiered in February 1929 at the Principal theater of Figueres, performed by the girls from the Patronat Municipal de la Catequística [Municipal Catechism Board]. On the press, it was announced as a "musical vision", performed as part of a whole-day event organized by the board, including cinematographic projections and other games for children. The vision would be performed again in May to celebrate the reception of the first communion of the children along with other comedies. Along with the corresponding music illustrations, the stage set was announced as designed by Mr. Jover, the usual scenographer for the Catechism board's productions.

The vision takes place in a doctor's clinic, in which a little boy holds a dialogue with the doctor and his father about medicine, science and faith. At the end, the little boy, who was a believer and had been explaining the miracles performed by the Virgin of Lourdes, dies. Along with a heavenly chorus, the Virgin of Lourdes makes a miraculous appearance to take the child and the father cries in relief and becomes devout.

The piece was published in the children's collection Biblioteca L'Escon. The author of the text, Agustí Burgas, also wrote other titles for this collection based on the staging of popular tales for children, like La fi del pare gegantàs, based on a folk tale from Empordà and announced as "proper for children", "an instructive piece, morally exemplifying".

Com estimen les mares [How mothers love] is a dramatic vision that presents reflections on life and death and the destiny of humans. A mother has a sick child and is visited by the angel of death, willing to give her life instead of her child's. She sings verisimilar folk melodies to her baby and light projections made of a game of shadows and magical lanterns are used during the play to project scenes of good and bad men, visualizing how the future of the child could be like. Eventually, the guardian angel appears to grant the child a longer life in mercy of the mother's devotion.

The piece, in one act, was written by Manuel Rocamora Rivera for amateur actors and was published in 1921. He had previously written other lyric pieces for the theater including folk songs for children, like La bruixa del gorc blau [The witch from the blue river pool], awarded a price in the Jocs Florals of 1912 and published in 1913. This piece was based in the creature from Catalan mythology known as "dona d'aigua" or undine, a character that tries to capture two little girls while they're singing folk songs, until an angel appears with a heavenly song and saves them. He even wrote very early pieces staging folk songs before the Catalan lyric movement had properly settled, like the case of La dama de Reus, written by Rocamora in 1894.

Other poetic visions were set in medieval times, with the appearance of noble characters like princesses and queens. The "poetic-dramatic vision of medieval mercy" La venjança de la reina [The queen's revenge] was premiered on February 26th, 1933, at the Catholic School of the Sagrat Cor de Jesús i Maria Immaculada in Barcelona. The text by priest Joan Puntí i Collell was published that same year as a theatrical piece for girls in one act. The piece is set in a rural town in medieval times. The villagers fear the start of a war led by the queen, since the countess that resides in town is the daughter of the queen's enemy. They go to the hermit bringing herbs and asking her for luck. However, when the queen eventually arrives, she shows mercy to the countess and names her member of her court, in a lesson of how you should not punish innocent people. The piece includes elements of religious faith and the chant of the hermit, rural characters that sing Catalan folk songs like El testament de l'Amèlia, and nobility characters that represent good moral values.

The case of Si jo fos princesa! [If I was a princess!] presents a little girl with nobility aspirations in life along with a princess that, based on a bucolic view of rural life, would prefer to be a shepherd. The piece includes a sung prayer by the princess praying to Virgin Mary to change her destiny in life, followed by a chorus of little demons dancing a sardana along "music of Stranvinskian sound". Then, angels appear to save them from the dancing demons, and a vision of this saint woman appears to them, teaching both of them the moral lesson that they have to conform with their position and what's been given to them in life. The epilog takes place on the day of Saint Therese, with a celebration and a popular dance in honor of the saint. The notes on the libretto explicitly mention that, since the appearance of the saint is a dream-like event, fantastic imagination allows for chronological incongruences, like the fact that a medieval princess has a vision of a saint that lived after her times.

The piece was written by priest Ramon Saborit Comellas and included music by Àngel Obiols. It was published in 1934 and announced as a theatrical piece for an ensemble of little girls. The medieval setting, moral teaching, the imagery of saint characters and little demons, the rhythmically irregular demons' dance followed by the saving saint… They are all characteristic elements from the musical visions' imagery. The piece was premiered on May 20th, 1934, at the Joventut Catòlica Femenina de Sarrià [Girls Catholic Youth of Sarrià]. Other traditionalist youth associations from the same neighborhood in Barcelona had previously premiered other musical visions.

The composer Àngel Obiols was the director of the choir Orfeò Sarrianenc and had also written the music for the "medieval lyric poem in three acts" El Príncep que cercà la felicitat [The prince that searched for happiness], published in 1933 with lyrics also by the same Ramon Saborit, and would publish in 1935 the "staging of a tale from Vallespir" in two acts L'Eloi, ferrer de Figueres [Eloi, blacksmith from Figueres], with lyric by Josep Ros i Artigas.

A last poetic vision worth mentioning is Lluïta d'ideals [Dispute of ideals], which stands out for its political republican and leftist explicit connotations, radically opposite to the rest of musical and poetic visions. The piece, subtitled as a "fantastic-mythologic vision" was written in one act by Joaquim Selva, from Badalona. It was published on 1932 and premiered on July 12th of that same year at the Gran Salón Cine Victoria, in Badalona, by Josep Oriol Lecuona's company. The stage director of the performance was Josep Oriol himself, and the musical parts were played by the horns and drums band from the Red Cross association of Badalona.

The piece presents an allegorical personification of political ideals of the moment, glorifying republican values and mocking monarchic ones. The piece is openly anti-war, presenting the personification of nature (which appears while Riego's anthem or the Marseillaise is playing) opposing that of war, as well as embodying the ministers on stage making a decision in favor of disarmament.

The author, Joaquim Selva, wrote multiple other pieces based on traditions from Badalona, usually with music by Joaquim Riera. Some of his titles, like El pa i la política [Bread and politics], a "revue of electoral customs" premiered in 1917 with Riera's music, also show his strong political republican values.

❖ "Plastic tableaux" in the Catholic tradition

The genre of musical visions developed by Graner from 1904 on was also popularly called "plastic tableaux", both for the pieces staged in Barcelona and across the regional network of venues. The effort that painters like Lluís Graner, Joaquim Vancells and Francisco Cuixart made in the stage design, painting exquisite backdrops on which they would project games of shadows and light effects, playing with the mixture of different colors and intensities gave this genre of pieces the name of "plastic tableaux".

After the closure of these halls, the genre was out of the professional and commercial theatrical offer. However, plastic tableaux continued being performed by Catholic amateur ensembles and especially by children in religious schools. One paradigmatic example would be the case of L'oració de la nit, premiered at the Saló Gerió and written by Rafael Masó and Joaquim Pecanins. This piece, firstly subtitled as a "crepuscular vision", continued on the repertoire of children's theater for many years, often performed in schools or gymnastics classes that would include gestural choreographies. The piece was the same original one originated in the context of musical visions, but for years it continued being announced as a "plastic tableau".

The topics were mostly religious, presenting some holy or saint character, or related to religious festivities, such as Christmas. The Catholic plastic tableaux recreated images or pictures on stage, accompanied by music, singing, short dialogues and special lighting. As well, the lack of dramatic action characteristic from Symbolist dramaturgy, which focused rather on the suggestion of emotions through visual and musical effects, was definitely a relevant inherited trait, as these pieces are characterized by dramatic stillness. The term was also often used for the live nativity scenes, in which each scene of the nativity story would be staged as a plastic tableau with music, sound and lights helping to recreate the emotion of the scene. They were conceived as the physical representation of an image.

Multiple examples can be found across Catalonia throughout time. For instance, on January, 1921, the Orfeó Mataroní celebrated an artistic event in Calella that included "animated folk songs and musical plastic tableaux[712]". In the early 1920s, priest Melé from Marató also organized plastic tableaux with people from the Saint Lluís congregation at the Escolapis school[713]. As well, in March 1922, the girls from the Col·legi de la Presentació in Figueres put on stage a plastic tableau that presented on the background the image of Saint Teresa surrounded by little angels and a "magnificent apotheosis of light", while a choir of girls sung a hymn by Gounod. The instrumental part was in charge of the quintet conducted by Mr. Cervera, and there were also rhythmic gymnastics exercises and an eucharistic dance[714].

In Olot, during the 1920s a series of plastic tableaux was performed at the Centre Catòlic [Catholic Centre]. As well, there are mentions from the late 1920s of the Casal Marià [Marian House] performing plastic tableaux, such as in the musical-dramatic performance arranged in the event of a visit in 1928 of the catechism class from Riudarenes including "lyric plastic tableaux[715]", and in the day of the Immaculate Virgin of 1929, when they arranged a session of "plastic tableaux", as well as dances, readings of poetry and biblical tableaux for the Patronage of the Immaculate Virgin in collaboration with the music band La Principal Olotina[716].

In 1930, one of the programs for the cultural events at the Casal Marià was fully published, including the title of one of these plastic tableaux: La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta [The Mother of God when she was little], which would correspond to the staging of the homonymous folk song, already brought to the stage in 1905 by Lluís Graner at the Mercè hall along a gestural choreography played by the little girls on stage.

> "Tomorrow, at 5:30 p.m. at the Casal Marià, the awards for the latest nativity scene contest will be distributed. Contrary to what is indicated in the programs, the event will unfold as follows: 1st part, distribution of the prizes; 2nd part, La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta, a rhythmic-plastic tableau in a grand display of lights and colors; 3rd part, the eminent folklorist Aureli Capmany will exemplify a series of Catalan popular tales; 4th part, plastic tableaux of shepherds and the adoration of angels, and finally a grand apotheosis for the adoration of the Three Wise Men, who will take part at the end of the evening and then form a luxurious cavalcade that will wind its way through the streets of Bisbe Guillamet, Firal, and the parish church, where the adoration of the Infant Jesus will take place. Tickets are available at Tenàs's until noon tomorrow[717]."

Again in 1931 at the Casal Marià, the plastic tableau of La Mare de Déu quan era xiqueta was reprised in Olot in an event organized by the Patronage of the Immaculate Virgin.

> "The young girls of the Patronage of Working Women in honor of the Immaculate Virgin conceived of a fitting vigil for their patrons on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, during which the song La Mare de Déu quan era petita and the apparitions of Our Lady of Lourdes were brought to the stage in the form of plastic tableaux. Two poems were also recited and a report on the Patronage's activities, both in its Night School section and in its Sunday School section, was read. We are very pleased that its effectiveness is becoming increasingly notable.
> As for the performance of the plastic tableaux, we should, to be fair, praise each of those who portrayed them, but we want to mention, for her grace, the five-year-old girl Riteta Pijoan i Matabosch, who, as a little girl, portrayed a most fitting Mother of God when she was little[718]."

A few years later, the same plastic tableau is announced in Figueres, performed by the girls' section of the Patronat de la Catequística [Catechism Board]:

"It doesn't lack a female section or a children's tableau. See the girls of the Parish Choir School in a Christmas plastic tableau, in the beautiful depiction of Our Lady as a little girl, surrounded by little angels who attended school…[719]"

The board also organized gymnastics classes for children, according to the modern pedagogical methods that figures such as Joan Llongueras were implementing in Catalonia applying the Dalcroze methods.

In December 1935, for the Christmas and the Three Wise Men festivities, the Catechism Board announced different performance arranged by school children. On December 26th, the children from the Sant Vicenç de Paül school played the rhythmic-plastic little tableau Les figures del pessebre [The figures from the nativity scene]. The piece was performed by 45 children, from which 24 were girls from the gymnastics class, one angel, one demon, and the rest would be children embodying the figures from the nativity scene. This tableau was followed by the legend in 3 acts La Ventafocs [the Catalan version of Cinderella], by Folch i Torres[720].

In July 1935, another plastic tableau performed by the girls of the Patronage of Working Women is documented. In this case, the piece would have presented on stage a scene about Eucharist.

> "[...] A splash of color was provided by the working women's section with their depiction of the Barcelona Corpus Christi procession. The song to the broom grass, beautifully recited by Paquita Moncanut, the giants' dance, and the plastic tableau of the Adoration of the Eucharist were of a moving beauty. [...][721]"

Around the same years, in July 1933, a great celebration in honor of the Virgin from Montserrat was organized at the hermitage of Montserrat, one of the most symbolic holy places for Catalan Catholicism. Among the activities organized, the children from Montserrat chapel's choir school performed Christ's passion as plastic tableaux, along with explanations of each scene, while singing verses of the Via Crucis that were answered by the choir[722].

One of the main sources of texts from plastic tableaux is the journal Taradell, a monthly issue published as a supplement of the parish journal in Vic. This city, which holds a long religious tradition, apparently nourished the genre of plastic tableaux during the 1950s. In the issue 200 of Taradell, published in May 1965, a compilation of the most remarkable dramatic texts published since the beginnings of the journal in 1949 was included, among which the following plastic tableaux are listed:

- Misericòrdia [Mercy], plastic tableau with a chant for boys or girls (August 1953),
- La mirada de la Verge [The look of the Virgin], plastic tableau with a chant for girls (June 1954),
- Sense mare [Motherless], plastic tableau with a chant for girls (August 1954),
- Bàlsam d'amor [Balsam of love], plastic tableau with a chant for boys or girls (December 1954),
- Enterrar els morts [To bury the dead], plastic tableau for boys (November 1957)

As well, in 1959, Taradell announced that the young actors from the parish Esbarjo Parroquial organized an evening on February 4th in which they performed the staged songs El virolet [Spinning top] and El rabadà [The shepherd], as well as the staged tales Les tres coques [The three cakes] and L'home dels nassos [The nosy man]. The premiere of the plastic tableau Aires de Pessebre [Airs of nativity scene] also took place[723].

Eventually, the "plastic tableaux" that were born from the genre of musical visions promoted by Lluís Graner remained in the religious theatrical tradition for decades as part of the amateur and popular repertoire. The Symbolist aesthetics from the Catalan Modernist period were eventually adapted and assimilated into the Catholic dramatic practice in the long term. The origin of this tradition linked to Graner's enterprise is reinforced by the lack of any trace or mention of this terminology before the opening of the Mercè hall in 1904, but the use of "plastic tableau" was extended for decades, at least until the 1950s within the Catholic theater repertoire for children.

Conclusions

The issue of creating and settling a genre of Catalan lyric theater has been defined in this dissertation as a sociocultural movement, made of people coming from the field of Catalan cultural nationalism. Under the perception that foreign genres of musical theater like Castilian zarzuela and Italian opera were occupying Catalan theaters, unable to provide Catalan peoples with a musical repertoire in Catalan language that they could feel recognized with, multiple initiatives started to be developed to solve this issue. They all shared the same goal: creating and settling a national genre of Catalan lyric theater. They gave their cause a name, "teatre líric català", and became conscious activist that promoted the project mainly through the press and cultural journals. However, their projects took different but parallel directions.

For most sectors within Catalan nationalism, promoting a national lyric theater repertoire to replace foreign genres that were so popular in Catalonia was a key issue. Cultural activism was, at this time, their main tool for spreading their message, reaching people, and promoting a change in their habits and perspectives on identity. Therefore, providing a Catalan-language repertoire was not only a social cause advocating for the use of the local language and removing the influence of the Castilian language from public spaces. It was also an ideological long-range weapon to spread a specific political vision of how Catalan nationality should be understood and seen, in a battle to determine which were the symbolic elements that constituted a cultural genre as "national".

It was during the period of Catalan Modernisme, the regional variant of the international Art Nouveau movement spanning the 1890s to the early 1920s, when a strong cultural mobilization took place to create Catalan national styles in different fields of art. Musical theater became of particular importance, viewed as the "total art" uniting all disciplines. Providing people with a repertoire of musical theater in Catalan so that they would not have to consume exclusively Spanish zarzuela, as well as modernizing Catalan rural folklore for performance in the cities, were central tasks for cultural activists in order to familiarize the population of industrial centers with Catalan language and folklore.

The structuring of the movement usually took shape in the form of short professional seasons, amateur venues, or travelling companies. An organizational attempt in the form of an association to coordinate their actions took place in 1903 with the creation of Foment del Teatre Líric Català, which had Adrià Gual as its director and theoretical leader of the movement for this period. However, the Espectacles-Audicions Graner tried to agglutinate all the different initiatives and trends within the movement in one single project under the leadership of Lluís Graner between 1905 and 1908.

The Teatre Líric Català arranged short seasons of operetta under the leadership of Enric Morera, the network led by the Sala Mercè promoted Symbolist musical visions following Catholic and traditionalist values, and multiple other authors wrote and extraordinarily premiered pieces out of lyric seasons. As well, they pressured the Catalan opera house, the Gran Teatre del Liceu, to accept the performance of operas in Catalan language, which only started to be allowed in the 1910s. Francesc Montserrat Ayarbe became the visible head of the last attempts of the movement's institutionalization in 1910 with the promotion of another short season of Teatre Líric Català and the later opening of a musical visions company in the Sala Imperi along Baldomer Marinel·lo.

It was, therefore, a process of bottom-up nation building, promoted by individuals that gathered and associated in the form of sociocultural movements to promote Catalan culture and language, and revindicate the present existence of a Catalan nationality. Projects within the nationalist spectrum, like the creation of a genre of Catalan lyric theater, were promoted by activist artists that, without the involvement of official institutions, tried to either create their own ones, or to act in the amateur field, involving people in their cause through cultural pedagogical projects. The fact that it was a sub-state nationalist movement definitively affected this approach, since they had to oppose official discourses and institutions, using their own means to promote their standpoints. In this process, they were not looking for economic benefit while creating new cultural products or producing new shows. Instead, their aim was to build up symbolic capital for the national movement, creating symbolic references for the popular shared imagery that would lay the foundations of a Catalan national culture. Many of the artists involved actually dedicated their personal fortunes to fund some of this projects in an activist move destined to bring people to their ideological cause.

Since musical theater was the dominant form of popular culture at the time, whoever controlled the stages would have the greatest social reach. Thus, different visions aroused regarding how the national lyric theater genre should be, and an internal battle within Catalanism to impose their artistic program was held. Multiple projects competed with each other and aggressive public discussions were held in the opinion press. Therefore, analyzing and categorizing the discourses shown in the press becomes an essential task to understanding the different views held within this lyric movement, because not all of the proposals that they defended succeeded writing and premiering new works. Due to this fact, although the study of the institutionalized companies and of the repertoire premiered on stage is still relevant and necessary, it is incomplete for fully understanding the range of different ideas and aesthetic considerations that existed about this issue.

On the one hand, the Catalan nationalist faction of Joventut and Art jove, clinging to the most radical and intransigent Modernism, argued that Catalonia's national genre should imitate Wagnerian musical drama and harshly criticized other proposals such as musical visions for their pedagogical, vitalistic character and, especially, because their main promoter Lluís Graner was a "moral" man. On the other hand, magazines specializing in photography and illustration were particularly in favor of the Espectacles-Audicions Graner and their musical visions because of the quality of the staging, as were more conservative publications linked to the Catholic sector, such as La Academia Calasancia, because of the constant references to religious imagery and their innocent and moralizing character. Also noteworthy are the reviews in the satirical press, such as Cu-Cut!, or those specializing in theater, such as La Escena catalana, which defended a model of Catalan theater closer to comedy, Costumbrismo style, and operetta, which was a more commercially viable product.

Although Catalan nationalism looked for the civic cohesion of society and intended to be a unified movement, there were clear religious and political differences within nationalist ideology that caused a segmented panorama. The nationalist activists and dedicated people that joined the lyric movement tried to structure it through the segmented networks they were affiliated with, but at the same time uniting in the same pluralist movement. This creates a panorama in which mainly associations from both Catholic traditionalist and anticlerical republican positions worked within the nationalist movement towards the same cultural goal, but opposing and even confronting each other. The genre of musical visions (the staging of folk songs and medieval legends from Catalan folklore) was mostly staged in a network of venues that was supported by Catholic institutions. The Moral Center of Girona, the Catholic center of Arenys de Mar and the Catholics' Association of Sabadell, among others, hosted companies of musical visions. On the other hand, Catalan operetta (a comic genre depicting rural traditions and customs of contemporary people aimed at entertaining the masses), was promoted by a network of leftist artists keen on the workers' movement like Enric Morera and Ignasi Iglésias.

In the practice, the segmented nature of the movement did not only result in theoretical or aesthetical differences, but also in different models of distribution of the repertoires. Enric Morera defended for his Catalan operetta a formal similarity to Spanish zarzuela so the already existing companies that were performing zarzuela could easily include them in their repertoire, calling for a substitution from within the established system. Morera commissioned many new titles for his season of Teatre Líric Català that later on were freely reprised and staged by other theaters, companies or amateur groups. L'alegria que passa would be the clearest paradigm of this model, being staged in more than 50 Catalan municipalities, simultaneously by the best professional companies and the most amateur groups.

On the contrary, Lluís Graner and the network of artists involved in the musical visions opted for a very different approach. Their proposal was to create a whole new and separate circuit of halls for which the musical visions would be exclusively dedicated. The Sala Mercè, Saló Gerió, Ars-Lucis and Saló Artístic would commission and produce musical visions and would even internally itinerate some of their productions. However, these titles did not circulate outside of the network of halls dedicated to this particular genre, due partially to the technical requirements regarding the electric lighting that the stagings required and that not every amateur company had access to.

When an external theater wanted to produce musical visions, they either hired the companies within the network for an official itineracy —like the company from the Mercè hall during their three-month visit at the Centre de Lectura in Reus— or had to plan a whole season dedicated to musical visions —like the Montserrat hall in Manresa—, but the staging of individual musical visions in a mixed season or the reprise of these titles outside the established network was extremely rare. The model of distribution of the genre was, therefore, based on the expansion of the network, which usually received the collaboration of the preexisting network of Catholic and moral centres to host the new companies on their buildings —like the Gerió hall was hosted at the Moral Centre of Girona or the Montserrat hall at the Catholic Centre of Arenys de Mar.

Nevertheless, in this network of halls dedicated to the musical visions, there was a prominent exception: the Espectacles-Audicions Graner. After a first season (1905/06) almost exclusively dedicated to produce musical visions, the project joined the ongoing political movement of Catalanist unification and opened up their scope of genres, including lyric drama and musical comedies, along with extraordinary seasons of spoken theater and musical concerts, becoming eventually the centralized institution for Catalan culture. The incidents at the Cu-cut! newspaper headquarters on October 25th of 1905 — just days after the opening of the first season— led towards the unification of political nationalism and the coalition around the new party Solidaritat Catalana. Therefore, Graner's goal became to congregate and gather Catalanist cultural activity in a single institution, unifying and strengthening the nationalist movement as a cultural parallel of what Solidaritat was doing bringing the nationalist political vote together.

Far from being a mere continuation of the Teatre Líric Català project (1901; 1903), the initiatives led by Lluís Graner at the Mercè hall (1904–1910) at the Rambla of Barcelona and the Espectacles-Audicions Graner (1905–1908) hosted at the Principal theater of the same city marked a change in the general trend of the Catalan lyric theater movement. Instead of simply becoming the sponsor of the existing lyric initiatives that were struggling to financially continue their activity —like Foment del Teatre Líric Català and its promotion of a season of Catalan operetta—, Lluís Graner decided to open up his own halls and form his own new companies, absorbing these preexisting initiatives like Foment del Teatre Líric Català by hiring its director, Adrià Gual, for his own new project. This way, he deactivated other entities that promoted different aesthetic proposals for the role of "the national genre".

Under the artistic direction of Lluís Graner, this enterprise intended to establish and institutionalize musical visions as the predilect proposal to become "the national genre". Their foundation can be traced to Adrià Gual's theory of "popular theater" and its materialization as "Catalan folk songs harmonized for the stage". However, the first premiere in 1899 under the title of Blancaflor was not well received by the public. The musical visions renewed this proposal under vitalist aesthetics and spectacular stagings to call the attention of the public, while at the same time staying closely linked to the precepts and influence of international Symbolist theater. The musical visions offered a combination of poetry, music, paintings and colored electric lighting that aimed to create emotional atmosphere and suggest feelings to the public through their senses. Therefore, it leaves behind the traditional preeminence of the text and the narration and resolution of conflicts as the base of the dramaturgy to connect with the European modernity.

As Adrià Gual foresaw with the aforementioned subtitle for Blancaflor as a "Catalan folk song harmonized for the stage", the musical visions were based on the staging of folk songs and legends. This process was based on a series of intertextual and intermodal connections through which the producers intended to "visualize" orally transmitted folklore, hence the term "musical vision". There was an ideological intention of modernizing traditional Catalan folklore by staging the songs and legends that folklorists were compiling from the rural areas of Catalonia with the most modern technological stage effects and under an avant-gardist dramaturgy based on sensorial suggestion. The goal was to make folklore attractive for the urban public of the newly inaugurated 20th century while promoting Catalan language and divulgating nationalist and moral values symbolized by folklore and religious elements portrayed on the pieces. This way, urban society and especially children could continue consuming traditional folklore in a modern form able to compete with other contemporary productions, ensuring the continuity and transmission of traditional culture.

Considering this context, the implementation of the genre of the musical visions within the Catalan lyric theater movement can be seen as a conservative impulse that redirected the movement from a disruptive Modernism —that called for a reinvention of culture rejecting the past tradition— to a more moral approach of conservative Modernism that reintroduces traditional content —such as folkloric quotations and religious values— while keeping the modernized form under the shape of Symbolist aesthetics and the use of electric technology for the staging. In addition to the artistic intention of connecting aesthetically with 20th-century modernity, musical visions were created as a tool to disseminate a Catalanist and Catholic ideological program as mass entertainment. The elements that make up the imagery of the musical visions are similar to those that make up the theoretical essence of Catalan identity and would have served to introduce the public to the cultural references on which conservative and Catholic Catalan nationalism was based.

The counts, kings, and princesses of popular folklore who appear on musical visions — framed in a medieval context that gives them timeless or ahistorical value— serve as symbols of the legislative tradition that Prat de la Riba considered necessary for a people to be considered a nation. In addition, there is the common language legitimized in the historical past by this same medievalism and the archaic characteristics of the used Catalan lexicon, as well as serving as a connecting element throughout time with the Catalan-speaking audience of the present. The sacred characters and places of worship that appear in the musical visions also have an ideological interpretation in terms of identity, linking Catalan nationality with Catholic sentiment as something intrinsic, following the doctrine of Torras i Bages. Therefore, we can talk about musical visions as a repertoire of lyrical theater based on the formal modernization of folklore and directly inspired by art theater and Symbolist dramaturgy. At the same time, it was a spectacle dedicated to the spread of nationalist ideology and the mass dissemination of the symbols that make up Catalan cultural identity according to the theories of the conservative and Catholic Catalanist sector.

Dramaturgically, it opted for a poetic and lyric flow between sung and spoken parts, using often instrumental parts as transitions. The scenes tended to be musically constructed on the variation of the same motif of melody, often taken from folk songs, that appeared and reappeared throughout the scene with textural variations on the instruments or voices playing it, as well as rhythmic and harmonic changes to adapt to the evolving mood of the scene. Besides folk quotations, the staging of legends and fables that didn't count with traditional music accompaniment, new folk-styled melodies would be written following the same structural procedure. As well, some musical topics seem to be identifiable when characters such as demons and angels appeared on stage, recurring to urban-styled references to represent evil and religious-sounding music when heavenly creatures appeared, while medieval characters would sing folk-styled intonations.

The particular characteristics of musical visions made people perceive them as a genre of lyric theater that differed from others. While other nomenclatures like "lyric drama" or "operetta" were often diluted into the term "zarzuela" by the Catalan press and public opinion, "musical visions" were quite distinctive and eventually became the label used to refer to Symbolist theater in general. They probably were the model that most approached the movement's goal of creating a distinctive and genuinely Catalan genre of lyric theater. Volumes II and III that compliment this dissertation provide a detailed catalogue of the venues and seasons that programmed musical visions, while volumes IV and V provide an edited sample of texts and scores of some of these pieces.

Lastly, a supranational perspective on the movement should be considered. While the distribution and circulation of the pieces stayed on a regional dimension and they were strongly based on local folklore, the movement did not have a localist nature and did not suppose the cultural isolation of Catalonia. We could speak, not only about international influence of Modernist artistic theories —such as the impact of European Symbolism on musical visions—, but also of transnational processes in the construction of nationalist cultures based on the revival of folklore that were not happening only in Catalonia, but across the whole Europe in sub-state regions that were experiencing a nationalist revival. The movement for a Catalan lyric theater was an initiative of cultural self-determination, led by the Catalan nationalist intellectuals, that publicly rejected the traditional foreign influences in lyric theater, such as Italian opera or Spanish zarzuela. This claim has left a historiographical impression that Catalan lyric theater was an isolated movement that rejected international connections, but the movement was actually quite opened and influenced by other European trends and transnational processes.

The transnational comparative analysis performed for this dissertation allows to conclude that, although there are clear contextual differences that affect the quality, quantity, and outcome of the studied repertoires, the underlying discourses about the need for a new national culture —one that paid special attention to musical theater— was shared among similar sub-state nationalist movement of the same period. Their creative approaches to nationalizing dramatic genres prove to be very similar in both of the studied national movements: Catalan and Lithuanian early 20th century revivals. The genres they approach to create a national culture, as well as the techniques and symbolic elements they employed to represent the national identity followed similar patterns. Thus, rather than creating entirely new "national genres" with unique styles or dramaturgies, these movements "nationalized" existing genres and aesthetic trends by inserting elements with symbolic national meaning: quotations of folk songs or folk-styled intonations, folk dances and rhythms, tales and myths arranged as plots for the plays, or depictions of traditional customs from the daily life of folk villagers.

Following the Modernist program, a plan to renovate Catalan national culture was unfolded, during which foreign contemporary authors were translated into Catalan and their styles were subsequently emulated by Catalan authors to revitalize the local culture. Santiago Rusiñol and Adrià Gual were captivated by the theatrical Symbolism represented by Maeterlinck. Both defended the reception of his work and began to write and stage their own productions following his decadent style. Symbolist aesthetics were mainly developed in the field of lyric theater, following the ideal of sensorial suggestion through the combination of poetic texts, plastic images and music. New musical dramaturgies were rehearsed by Enric Morera as the composer for the music in Rusiñol's lyric dramas, as well as after Adrià Gual's theorization of the "folk song harmonized for the stage", first essayed by Granados in Blancaflor.

In response to the initial abrupt and radical cultural modernization, an eventual backlash took place to revindicate the national tradition, modernizing it by assimilating the new imported styles. A conservative impulse, rather common in contexts of radical progressist change, reintroduced traditional and folk content into the new forms and aesthetics to preserve the elements of the national identity. Once Rusiñol had detached himself from the decadent style, the approach to lyric theater formerly theorized by Adrià Gual was revived by Lluís Graner for the further development of the repertoire in a vitalist key. The implementation of his theory on popular theater approached the staging of folk songs in the genre of "musical visions" from a Modernist perspective of cultural regeneration rather than from a traditional folklorist standpoint.

Therefore, the early foundational repertoire of Catalan lyrical theater was significantly influenced by Symbolism. Nevertheless, Wagnerism was the only international influence publicly recognized. Although it was not the most recent avant-gardist reference at the moment, the successful reception of Wagner's work during Catalan Modernisme served to introduce an alternative model to traditional Mediterranean influences. Wanting to break away from them, Wager became thus a renewing influence. He represented a different model of lyric theater, with more literary and dramaturgical weight and less melodic preponderance. It conceptualized and symbolized the needs and goals of the movement: revindicating Wagnerism was a nationalist statement on the creation of a national genre that represented the present nation through its common past. But the main characteristic taken from Wagnerism, the use of folkloric mythology as the base for a national lyric theater, was a transnational technique used generally in nationalisms and common in other Modernist nationalisms.

Despite that, the influence of Wagnerism coexisted with other influences with which it interferes and which have a more recognizable weight in the final result brought to the stage, such as Maeterlinckian Symbolism. The treatment of the dramatic action, the short one-act format, and the scenographic conception bring the genre of musical visions closer to the Symbolist sphere. To such point, that it even provoked criticism from certain Catalanist sectors for being considered un-Wagnerian, despite the presence of ideas such as the “total work of art”, the union of music and text, and the use of legend inherited from Wagner. Even though the final form and style of the musical vision genre differs from that of Wagnerian drama, the ideological goal that both processes present is similar enough to consider Wagner a role model of reference. Therefore, we can speak of Catalan lyric theater as a movement that shifted its foreign influences from the Mediterranean to the Germanic context, and its interest in local folklore is shared with other European nationalist movements of the moment. It followed the general dynamics of contemporary art in the modernization of culture and the conservative reaction we see in the process is also common in contexts of radical progressist change.

Was there, to conclude, a national genre of Catalan lyric theater? Despite all the theorization and the nationalist discourses that were repeated over and over on the press about the need to create a new genre, unique and intrinsically tied to the Catalan national identity, the result in the practice turned otherwise. Instead of coming up with a new genre that would differentiate Catalan culture from any other, based on the conception that all nations should have their own genre of opera, the initiatives and projects that took place within the movement of Catalan lyric theater were aimed at the “nationalization” of preexisting genres. Musical comedy, operetta or Catalan zarzuela, Symbolist theater and opera, they were all preexisting genres that were adapted by introducing elements linked to the Catalan identity. The use of Catalan language, quotations of folk songs and characters coming from Catalan mythology, the dance of sardanas, as well as the depiction of traditional rural scenes with folk people from the countryside were introduced according to the aesthetics of each genre to adapt the pieces to the intended representation of the Catalan identity.

This dissertation has contributed to unveiling the internal functioning and structure of the Catalan lyric theater movement: it’s bottom-up perspective on cultural nation-building, the search for nationalist symbolic capital, the engaging of amateur sectors of society in the national project, and the ideological internal segmentation of the movement. As well, the genre of musical visions (largely unapproached by previous literature) has been defined, catalogued and documented. In the process, the unknown network of venues dedicated to the production of musical visions, ranging from Girona to Reus, has been identified, as a fair territorial representation of the cultural activity going on in Catalonia. Nevertheless, a last note should point towards further lines of research that have proved to be worth developing throughout the research process that led to this dissertation.

Firstly, as a result of the historical frame developed in this thesis for the Catalan lyric theater movement, the analysis of individual pieces to define the musical techniques and compositional abilities of the works that form the repertoire should be conducted. Proven the plurality of the movement and the multiplicity of artistic approaches, the dissertation provides a flexible frame in which pieces can be properly examined and analyzed without preconditioning elements, like the Wagnerian influence that was necessarily looked for in every case of study conducted until now given the obsolete and limited state of the literature. The definition of the musical visions genre given here should promote the correct analysis of these pieces under the light of a Symbolistic dramaturgy and the aesthetic value of staging folklore. The musical topics identified are worth further studying in a future project to verify their presence across the repertoire and define in detail the musical techniques used in each of them.

Following the case of study about the performances of L'alegria que passa throughout time and in amateur and provincial venues, other titles could be approached, reinforcing the documentation of the spreading of the genre. The case, for instance, of La reina del cor potentially enjoyed a similar wide spread with numerous productions throughout Catalonia, as has been glimpsed during the research process of this dissertation, although not monographically approached. Similarly, attention should be paid to lyric performers, tracking their careers to identify further lyric productions, amateur seasons or extraordinary events. The case of Assumpció Paricio, who was present in every single professional season organized from 1901 to 1923, points towards the relevance of performers in the materialization and spreading of the Catalan lyric movement. For instance, following her projects led to identify the travelling company she directed in 1915 along Artur Balot, when no impresarios were investing on the settling of professional lyric seasons in the capital city. Therefore, tracing the steps of the careers of Catalan lyric singers could potentially lead to uncovering similar projects.

Lastly, once proved that the Catalan lyric theater repertoire was not chaotic, but internally divided in different segments that promoted different lyric genres, these should be further catalogued. The additional volumes of this dissertation that compliment this first one provide a full catalogue of the musical visions repertoire, with no evidence or signs that other halls or seasons could have been arranged within the documented network of venues led by Graner. However, the Teatre Líric Català seasons have not been yet properly catalogued and analyzed, there has not been a systematic study tracing Catalan operettas of this period, the translated foreign comedies and the widespread Catalan zarzuela. Although some lyric dramas have been individually studied, no systematic study has catalogued either all lyric dramas premiered in Catalan during this period from a comprehensive approach. There is still a long way to go until the full complexity of the Catalan lyric theater repertoire is understood and documented given the considerably large amount of titles performed, which also indicate the sociocultural relevance and impact of musical theater in Modernist Catalonia. At least, this dissertation provides a comprehensive approach to musical visions and outlines the path to follow leading towards the rest of lyric genres that made up the Catalan repertoire.

List of musical visions

[Works marked in gray were written but never performed].

[The text and music columns are marked in cases that relevant documents have been preserved. If the mark appears in parentheses, it is because the documents are partial or alternative versions instead of the finished final one (fragments of the text, non-stage versions, or reductions for voice and piano)].

[The entries corresponding to each title can be found in their respective catalogs in volumes II and III of this thesis].

[The lyrical works premiered at the Espectacles-Audicions Graner that do not belong to the genre of musical visions, even if they appear in the catalog, are not included in this list. Similarly, titles announced at the beginning of the season that were never written have not been included, but those for which written material remains and those that were announced in rehearsal but never premiered have been included].

Els Espectacles-Audicions Graner van tenir lloc al teatre Principal de Barcelona entre octubre de 1905 i juny de 1908. Van ser, com el seu nom reflecteix, una empresa cultural iniciada pel pintor Lluís Graner, que va pretendre aglutinar al cor de Barcelona a la intel·lectualitat catalana per oferir espectacles lírics de primer nivell per al públic de la ciutat, a més d'un extens programa de teatre declamat i de concerts musicals que, amb caràcter pedagògic, esperava donar a conèixer els clàssics simfònics i teatrals internacionals.

Aquest volum presenta l'activitat de l'empresa a través de la reconstrucció de la seva programació i cartellera, de la profusa documentació de la seva oferta cultural i recepció pública a la premsa, i cataloga les estrenes de teatre líric que va produir al teatre Principal. Consta de tres seccions principals, cadascuna dedicada a una de les tres temporades d'activitat de l'empresa. Aquestes seccions consten de:

- un resum inicial sobre els esdeveniments que tenen lloc durant la temporada,
- les dades administratives i de funcionament de l'empresa (horaris, preus, membres de la companyia...),
- una cartellera en forma de llistat amb les dates de representació de cadascuna de les obres teatrals representades durant la temporada,
- un llistat de les obres de teatre declamat representades,
- un llistat dels esdeveniments extraordinaris, funcions d'abonament i concerts amb els seus programes,
- un catàleg de les obres de teatre líric, amb una classificació inicial entre les noves, les represes o les anunciades sense arribar a representar-se, amb una fitxa documentant cadascuna de les noves estrenes
- una selecció de notícies i ressenyes d'especial interès sobre l'empresa publicades al llarg de la temporada

Finalment, una última secció presenta els esdeveniments que tenen lloc després de la marxa de Graner del teatre Principal i quin va ser el futur tant del pintor com de la companyia dramàtica de l'empresa. Una última selecció de notícies presenta com van perviure els Espectacles-Audicions Graner a la memòria del teatre i cultura catalanes i dels seus col·laboradors.

Sobre el contingut de les fitxes de cada obra, que són el punt central que motiven la documentació de la resta de l'activitat de l'empresa, cal aclarir la seva estructura i criteri. Primerament, s'han inclòs fitxes només de les obres líriques que eren estrenes absolutes dins de l'empresa. Altres, com les represes del repertori del Teatre Líric Català de Morera o altres més antigues o traduïdes, són mencionades com a part de les representacions de la temporada, però no documentades d'igual manera.

Dins de cada fitxa es poden trobar les dades bàsiques d'identificació de l'obra: el títol i subtítol, número d'actes, la data d'estrena, autors i fonts, juntament amb la portada de l'edició del text (o del manuscrit si no va ser impresa). A més, s'hi inclou la transcripció de les acotacions escèniques del llibret amb les fotografies localitzades de la posada en escena i dels actors. S'ha optat per aquesta opció, en lloc de redactar un resum de l'argument, perquè reflecteix amb molt més detall la dramatúrgia de l'obra i de quina manera són presentats els fets; cosa essencial en el cas de les visions musicals, basades més en la suggestió a través dels elements escènics que en la narració de fets en sí mateix. Tot i això, s'han complementat alguns casos on la informació de les acotacions era massa escassa amb alguns comentaris entre claudàtors per facilitar la comprensió de l'obra.

S'ha optat, també, per no incloure un llistat dels actors i actrius que van representar cada obra, atès que la companyia que operava al teatre era estable i els noms dels involucrats sempre eren els mateixos. Una última secció amb transcripcions de crítiques i ressenyes de premsa sobre l'obra, en molts casos, inclou també comentaris de premsa on se citen els actors i els seus papers i que expliquen els arguments de les obres, per la qual cosa resultaria redundant repetir-los. Cal remarcar la pluralitat de les fonts hemerogràfiques consultades, que inclou, no només els diaris teatrals o culturals especialitzats, sinó també la premsa general de notícies, els diaris artístics il·lustrats, els satírics i els de caràcter religiós i polític. Davant aquest ventall d'opinions, queda patent la pluralitat de pensaments que existia en aquest moment i els diferents criteris a l'hora d'avaluar les obres, ja siguin artístics, polítics o morals.

Les transcripcions de text hemerogràfic, al igual que els noms i títols, han estat normalitzats ortogràficament, atès que, fins i tot en aquell moment, les diferents formes d'escriure els mateixos noms generava confusions i incomprensions (com ara, quan intenten catalanitzar el cognom de "Giménez" com a "Ximeniç", o quan s'intenta substituir la "ll" per "ly"). Entès com a text informatiu i no de caràcter literari, primant la comprensió de la informació, s'ha actualitzat l'ortografia i puntuació segons els criteris actuals per facilitar-ne la lectura. En el cas del lèxic i de la gramàtica, s'han mantingut les conjugacions, grafies i formes d'expressions arcaiques, populars i de castellanismes que, tot i no ser normativament correctes ara, són característiques del parlar d'aquest moment i denoten la personalitat i l'estil del redactor.

Les imatges incloses també han estat, en molts dels casos, editades de manera digital per reduir el deteriorament causat pel pas del temps als materials d'impressió i intentar recuperar els colors i detalls originals. Sobretot, s'ha reduït la saturació dels grocs en els casos de paper esgrogueït que originalment era blanc, i s'ha reduït el soroll i la pixelació en les imatges impreses a premsa de baixa qualitat. En el cas d'algunes fotografies de les quals només es conservava el negatiu en vidre, s'han invertit i corregit els colors per veure la imatge tal com hauria estat revelada.

Exposada l'estructura i criteris tinguts en compte a l'hora de presentar aquest catàleg, cal començar amb un breu preludi sobre com va arribar Lluís Graner al teatre Principal, sota quines condicions econòmiques va acordar el seu lloguer i quin aspecte tenia el teatre durant la seva peripècia empresarial.

El teatre Principal de Barcelona, ubicat a la Rambla principal de la ciutat que creua de plaça Catalunya a Drassanes, era en aquest moment propietat de l'Hospital de la Santa Creu. La direcció empresarial del teatre sortia a concurs per contractes quinquennals i la proposta més moral i que més percentatge de beneficis oferís a l'hospital guanyaria el concurs. No era, però, un teatre fàcil de dirigir. A principis del segle XX, la burgesia i la població de majors rendes ja havia migrat als nous barris de l'Eixample, amb pisos més grans i amb més comoditats, quedant els estrets carrerons de la ciutat vella per a la població treballadora i de classe més baixa. Aquest públic freqüentava més aviat els teatres de revista i comèdia del Paral·lel, i els veïns de l'Eixample arribaven fins al Romea i al Liceu, quedant el Principal "massa avall" de la Rambla i entre dues aigües.

Entre rumors i especulacions que el teatre acabaria destinat a gèneres "depravats" o reconvertit en la seu d'un banc, Lluís Graner decideix apostar per fer una inversió que reformi i renovi l'edifici perquè aquest torni a ser un dels centres culturals de Barcelona. Pretén que el Principal aglomeri i aglutini a la intel·lectualitat catalana per oferir tant a les classes treballadores com benestants espectacles d'alta qualitat que glorifiquin la cultura catalana.

Quan el lloguer de Caferino Palencia acaba al final de la temporada 1904/05, comença a operar al teatre amb un contracte d'estiu Pasqual Andreu amb sessions de cinematògrafs i altres espectacles de varietats fins al 30 de setembre. Sembla que l'empresari esperava quedar-s'hi tota la temporada següent, ignorant que el seu contracte d'estiu era temporal per ocupar el teatre només mentre es convocava i resolia el concurs quinquennal. El 24 de juliol escriu a la junta de l'hospital queixant-se del desconeixement del concurs, del que acabava de tenir notícia i que se celebraria el 2 d'agost, perquè si no li renoven el contracte no podrà recuperar tota la inversió feta per acomodar el teatre als seus espectacles. Sembla que va escriure un esborrany de proposta i oferta de lloguer per al concurs, però tan precipitadament que no el va acabar de signar ni de datar.

Qui sí havia enviat una oferta al concurs quinquennal per ocupar el teatre entre octubre de 1905 i maig de 1910 eren Antoni Estrada, Manuel Salvat i Lluís Graner. Les condicions del concurs de lloguer exigien:

- Representacions adequades a la moral, pudor i decoro.
- Prohibits balls de màscares de tota mena.
- Almenys 130 funcions públiques de nit per temporada.
- Les temporades dividides en tres terminis: d'octubre a desembre, de gener a març i d'abril a final de temporada el 31 de maig. S'exigia un mínim de 50 funcions en primer i segon termini, i un mínim de 30 en el tercer.

- El teatre no pot donar funcions en Setmana Santa, del Diumenge de Rams al Dissabte de Glòria, i ha de romandre tancat aquests dies.
- Tots els sous dels empleats, llum i despeses de funcionament del teatre pagades per l'empresari. Interventor, conserge i porter reben 5, 4 i 3 pessetes. A l'interventor se li paga cada dia de funció, mentre que al conserge i porter per quinzenes per avançat. Encarregats de maquinaria, 27,5 pessetes per funció. Gent de neteja, 7,5 pessetes per dia, més plus de 0,75 els dies amb funcions extra.
- A càrrec del manteniment i reparació dels aparells i maquinaria del teatre.
- L'hospital i l'ajuntament es reserven dos llotges i tres seients de platea.
- L'hospital es reserva el taller de pintura, el foyer de ball, el portal i les taquilles on es venen els bitllets.
- El bar ha d'estar obert tota la funció perquè els socis de l'Ateneu Barcelonès puguin creuar del teatre a l'ateneu sense sortir al carrer.

Coneixem que l'oferta d'Estrada, presentada el 16 de juny, proposava instal·lar un cinematògraf i espectacles de varietés al Principal. Salvat, per la seva banda, ofereix superar els requeriments amb 150 funcions per temporada i oferint a l'hospital el 10% dels ingressos, garantint un mínim de 18.000 pessetes. Graner, amb força interès, escriu el 31 de juliol, dos dies abans de la celebració del concurs, per millorar la seva oferta al 15% i un mínim de 20.000 pessetes i puja la fiança depositada de 3.000 a 5.000 pessetes. El dia 2 d'agost els participants paguen un dipòsit de 1.500 pessetes per formar part del concurs, del qual resulta guanyador Lluís Graner.

El lloguer de Graner comença l'1 d'octubre de 1905 i durant el primer mes farà diverses peticions a la junta de l'hospital mentre instal·la i acomoda la seva empresa. Demana que li cedeixin els espais del "foyer de baile" i el taller de pintura per fer-los servir com a taller de sastreria i altres operacions. La junta ho accepta, tot i que després vindran reclamacions perquè s'hi excedeix i ocupa massa espais comuns guardant les escenografies. Els farà servir com a dipòsit de roba, mobles i altres objectes escenogràfics.

La reforma del teatre inclourà l'electrificació total del teatre: bombetes de colors a l'escenari, llums al fossat de l'orquestra perquè vegin les partitures, il·luminació elèctrica del pati de butaques i espais interiors, i fins i tot l'exterior amb cartells lluminosos. Les vidrieres de la façana del teatre van ser dissenyades per Adrià Gual i els cartells que anunciaven les obres amb dissenys cal·ligràfics diferents per a cada títol eren pintats pel mateix Graner, que també va fer els dissenys de llums d'algunes de les primeres produccions. El 10 d'octubre es comunica el llistat de nous empleats al teatre: Pedro Bofill, José Domingo, Francisco Giner, Antonio Torrent, Salvador Ferrer, Isidro Albert, Miguel Castells; Ramón Jacas com a encarregat general el personal; Luís Via com a encarregat de la vigilància de l'escenari.

La inauguració de la temporada es preveia per al dia 12 (tot i que s'acaba endarrerint per complicacions en la instal·lació dels efectes especials pirotècnics d'El comte l'Arnau) i Graner demana permís a la junta per col·locar una bandera catalana a la façana del teatre com a part de la instal·lació ornamental i reformes del teatre. Remarca el caràcter cultural i no polític del fet, juntament amb l'objectiu artístic i educatiu de la seva empresa, convidant als membres de la junta de l'hospital a assistir a les representacions del Principal per mostrar suport a la seva empresa.

Part de l'equip artístic de l'empresa es va traslladar al Principal des de la sala Mercè, com ara Adrià Gual com a director d'escena o actors com Artur Balot, Ramon Tor, Lluís Puiggarí i Mercè Viola, alguns dels quals provenien del teatre aficionat i havien tingut a la sala Mercè la seva primera experiència professional. Els Espectacles-Audicions Graner van estar, de fet, caracteritzats per la barreja entre autors i intèrprets de prestigi i els més joves i novells. Joan B. Lambert i Josep Carner, que també havien començat a la sala Mercè, eren en aquest moment dos jovenets que començaven la seva carrera professional del costat de Lluís Graner, l'un com a director d'orquestra i l'altre com a escriptor. De fet, Lambert va tenir estreta relació personal amb la família Graner i Carner estava contractat de manera fixa per l'empresa per arranjar els textos de les produccions que Graner li encarregava.

Algunes dades que coneixem sobre la gestió econòmica i salaris percebuts pels encàrrecs directes que feia l'empresa són que Carner, per aquesta tasca d'arranjador literari, cobrava 60 duros (300 pessetes) mensuals i que Joan Llongueras va cobrar per les il·lustracions musicals d'El malalt imaginari (la cançó del malalt) 8 duros (40 pessetes). Les instruccions eren que les visions musicals havien de durar entre 20 i 25 minuts i se solia donar un termini de 20 dies per escriure-les i lliurar els materials a l'empresa.

Hi ha molts casos en els quals els autors no van arribar a complir els encàrrecs i les obres no es van arribar a estrenar. Per exemple, Joan Llongueras va tenir dificultats per orquestrar L'any mil i va acabar renunciant a l'encàrrec i recorrent a Pedrell per prendre classes. En altres casos, l'autor anunciat a principi de temporada acabava per no escriure l'obra i s'encomanava a una altra persona; per a aquests casos Enric Morera era el compositor comodí que sempre estava disponible per rescatar l'empresa en l'últim minut, com va ser el cas de La santa espina, quan Amadeu Vives (com en altres quantes ocasions) s'havia anunciat com a autor i finalment no va escriure la música.

També hi ha casos en els que es recuperen obres de col·laboradors ja escrites que no s'havien estrenat en el seu moment, o que la premsa anuncia que els materials d'una obra han arribat a l'empresa i que fins i tot s'estan assajant, sense finalment veure's estrenada la peça. Per als casos que no són encàrrecs, en els quals els autors lliuren a l'empresa les seves obres venent els drets de representació, els preus variaven molt depenent del caixet de l'autor. Per exemple, Jaume Nonell rep 50 pessetes per vendre el text de la comèdia lírica La festa de les donzelles als Espectacles-Audicions Graner, mentre que, durant la mateixa temporada, Enric Morera i Àngel Guimerà reben, cadascun, 1.000 pessetes per la cessió dels drets de representació durant 1 any de La reina vella.

Tot i que l'empresa va produir grans èxits, els problemes econòmics van estar presents des del seu inici, degut a una gestió de naturalesa deficitària. Graner tancarà la primera temporada amb un dèficit de 50.000 pessetes que adjudica a les inversions fetes per reformar i adequar el teatre, per la qual cosa demana el 18 de juliol de 1906 a la junta de l'hospital que rebaixin el percentatge d'ingressos de taquilla que perceben del teatre del 15% al 10%, argumentant que han rebut en total molt més de les 20.000 pessetes anuals estipulades com a mínim. La junta acorda una rebaixa de la recaptació al 12%, mantenint-la al 15% per a les funcions fora de temporada, com eren les d'estiu.

A inicis de la temporada següent, l'octubre de 1907, Graner tornarà a demanar la mateixa rebaixa al 10%. Remarca la revitalització que ha fet del teatre, que estava en estat de deixadesa tant a nivell arquitectònic com per la qualitat dels espectacles que s'hi feien, i que ha fet retornar al públic selecte que havia deixat d'anar-hi per trobar-se el teatre massa lluny del nou eixample de la ciutat. Remarca que els seus espectacles han estat reconeguts com a "obras de cultura y reconocimiento moral", esplèndids i ben presentats, que resulten un èxit moral i estètic, i econòmic per a la junta, però que per ell són "una verdadera desgracia y de resultado absolutamente negativo".

Sobre el deute acumulat, Graner retreu a la junta que la recaptació ha augmentat molt en relació als ingressos previs que feia el teatre amb altres empresaris, i que per això la junta ha rebut 60.000 pessetes per les dues primeres temporades. És a dir, que, si el mínim per temporada que havia de rebre l'hospital era de 20.000 pessetes, la junta hauria rebut unes 10.000 pessetes més per temporada, un 50% més per sobre del mínim estipulat.

No obstant això, Graner manifesta una pèrdua "real y efectiva" (és a dir, no quantitat de despeses, sinó pèrdues que els ingressos rebuts tampoc han cobert) de 150.000 pessetes per a les dues primeres temporades. Si la primera temporada tancava amb un dèficit de 50.000 pessetes, la segona ha generat un dèficit de 100.000, tot i presentar èxits esclatants de públic com va ser La santa espina, cosa que reforça l'argument que el model empresarial era de naturalesa deficitària i que el màxim de taquilla no arribava a cobrir les despeses generades per la representació.

Per l'inventari i taxació de les escenografies que es fa per la clausura de l'empresa, sabem que les despeses en escenografies van ser d'almenys unes 30.000 pessetes per temporada, atès que Lluís Graner encarregava decorats i vestuaris nous per a cada producció amb materials de primera qualitat. Per això, la tercera temporada va reutilitzar escenografies prèvies i pràcticament no va fer nous encàrrecs.

La junta resol el 8 d'octubre mantenir el 12% fins que la recaptació arribi al mínim de 20.000 pessetes anuals, i una vegada coberta aquesta quantitat, que la recaptació baixi al 6% tant per les funcions cinematogràfiques com teatrals.

Amb aquestes xifres, podem calcular que, de manera aproximada, la primera temporada va generar 200.000 pessetes de taquilla i la segona, 250.000. Si calculem l'equivalència d'aquestes quantitats d'acord a les fluctuacions històriques de l'IPC, actualment equivaldrien a aproximadament 900.000 i 1.300.000 euros. Graner va delegar la direcció de l'empresa quan el seu deute arribava a un equivalent actual als 680.000 euros.

Temporada de 1905-1906

DIRECCIÓ GENERAL:

Lluis Graner

Inauguració 12 d' Octubre

Temporada 1905/06

La primera temporada dels Espectacles-Audicions Graner, inaugurada el 14 d'octubre de 1905, va centrar la proposta lírica en el gènere de les visions musicals, amb el qual el seu director artístic, Lluís Graner, ja havia experimentat durant la temporada anterior. Adrià Gual, el director escènic, havia estat l'ideòleg que va teoritzar el model de la "cançó popular harmonitzada per a l'escena", de les quals se'n recuperen dues per a produir-les al teatre.

El comte l'Arnau va inaugurar la temporada, generant un gran èxit per la seva espectacularitat en escena, que feia servir llums de colors, efectes especials i fins i tot pirotècnia en escena. Es tracta, però, d'un teatre molt pictòric i visual, basat en la suggestió d'emocions a través de la creació de diferents ambients sensitius mitjançant la combinació d'efectes visuals, musicals i poètics, al qual el públic no hi està acostumat. En els quadros que tenen una dramatúrgia més arrelada en la plàstica i la poètica, com ara La matinada o La Nit de Nadal, noten la falta d'acció dramàtica i desenvolupament narratiu característics d'una proposta simbolista, per la qual cosa les properes visions musicals aniran agafant un caràcter literari més narratiu i dependent de la paraula.

Continuant amb les polítiques que caracteritzaven la seva tasca al Teatre Íntim, durant la primera meitat de la temporada tindran gran pes els dilluns dramàtics i abonaments de vetllades selectes i "thes" d'hivern, dedicats a les representacions de teatre parlat. Com a encarregat de la part teatral, Gual va incidir en la representació de grans títols internacionals i de la història del teatre traduïts al català, amb una intenció pedagògica cap a la culturització del públic. Entre els autors representats estan els noms d'Ibsen, Hauptmann i Bjørnson, intercalats amb els de Shakespeare, Molière o Cervantes; fins i tot clàssics grecs com Eurípides o Sòfocles.

A partir del febrer comencen a alternar-se les noves produccions de visions musicals amb represes del repertori de la temporada de teatre líric català d'Enric Morera i Ignasi Iglésias al Tívoli (1900), amb grans èxits com ara L'alegria que passa i La reina del cor. Les cançons populars harmonitzades per a l'escena d'Adrià Gual estrenades a la primavera tenen força èxit, especialment La presó de Lleida, i ajuden a consolidar la proposta simbolista de les visions musicals. Guanyarà força el repertori líric, i el dramàtic quedarà pràcticament només per a les sessions extraordinàries dels abonaments dramàtics.

Gual abandona la direcció escènica de l'empresa al final de la temporada veient el desequilibri econòmic que està provocant. Ell, com a director del Teatre Íntim, coneixia els drames pressupostaris que suposa la producció teatral i no volia ser partícip de la fallida econòmica que preveia que el seu amic Graner patiria. Cal remarcar que, tot i que la premsa va lligar l'activitat del Teatre Íntim de Gual als Espectacles-Audicions Graner, no va haver-hi cap relació formal entre les dues empreses. Gual, com a director escènic del Principal, programava el repertori de les vetllades de teatre parlat seguint els seus ideals d'importació del teatre estranger i recuperació dels clàssic, al igual que feia de manera particular amb la seva empresa de l'Íntim, però mai van unir-se ni cap representació del Principal va portar el segell o menció de responsabilitat de l'Íntim.

D'igual manera, Enric Morera va escriure moltes de les partitures de la temporada, però tampoc va tenir cap càrrec de direcció ni programació musical. Enric Morera, durant aquesta època, no residia ni a la ciutat de Barcelona; correspon als anys que el compositor va passar a Sitges i totes les partitures de la seva música per als espectacles del Principal estan datades i signades des de Sitges. Per tant, al igual que el cas de Gual, l'empresa de Teatre Líric Català d'Enric Morera tampoc va tenir cap relació ni responsabilitat sobre els Espectacles-Audicions Graner. De fet, com a proposta dramatúrgica era bastant oposada i els valors ideològics que representen tots dos repertoris són bastant distants. Morera feia exclusivament de compositor al qual encarregaven música per a les obres programades. En alguns casos també va presentar artistes del seu cercle de contactes a Lluís Graner per establir noves col·laboracions, com va ser el cas d'Àngel Guimerà, i va cedir el repertori de la seva empresa anterior al Tívoli per ser representat per la companyia del Principal, però Morera no programava ni participava de la direcció de l'empresa.

Setmanes abans de la inauguració de la temporada es va especular amb qui seria el director musical i es van anunciar diversos noms, entre ells el del mateix Morera, el de Francesc Pujol i el de Joan Lambert, que fins llavors feia de pianista a la sala Mercè, i que finalment va ser el nom triat com a director musical del Principal durant tota la durada dels Espectacles-Audicions Graner. De fet, Lambert tenia relació amb les agrupacions i joventuts tradicionalistes i carlistes de Barcelona, ideologia que compartia amb Lluís Graner; fins i tot es deia a l'època que va estar promès amb una de les filles de Lluís Graner, fins que el pintor va exiliar-se a Amèrica i el compromís es va trencar.

Un altre punt remarcable de la programació del teatre van ser els concerts de música. Lluís Graner va fer servir de la seva bona relació amb Lluís Millet (que ja havia portat a col·laboracions artístiques prèvies per a la sala Mercè) per establir una sèrie de concerts de Quaresma per l'Orfeó Català al teatre Principal. L'Orquestra Filharmònica Barcelonesa que dirigia Josep Lassalle també va trobar un bon aliat en Lluís Graner, qui compartia el desig de fer conèixer el repertori simfònic internacional al públic barceloní, una tasca pedagògica semblant a la que portava a terme Gual en la part teatral. Al Principal va sonar música de noms com Mozart, Beethoven, Händel o Haydn. L'Associació Musical de Barcelona va jugar, també, un paper intermediari com a organitzadora de les sèries de concerts al Principal, programant artistes com ara Pau Casals, Joan Manen o Joan Massià, a més d'alguns destacats intèrprets internacionals, com ara Paderewski o els Crickboom.

La temporada acaba el 4 de juny i comença una d'estiu només de cinematògraf, reduint els preus d'entrada i butaca a 0,25 pessetes i de palco amb 6 entrades a 2 pessetes.

[1] Tot i que el programa d'inauguració de temporada no inclou el llistat de membres, que sí que apareix als programes de les següents temporades, s'ha reconstruït la plantilla de la companyia parcialment mitjançant el procés de documentació i catalogació de les produccions escèniques.

[2] Tot i que el seu nom apareix anunciat, no consta cap activitat seva relacionada a l'empresa una vegada iniciada la temporada.

[3] Plantilla reconstruïda segons la instrumentació de les partitures de les obres líriques.

[4] Josep Carner estava contractat amb sou fix per escriure les adaptacions escèniques de les rondalles i llegendes encarregades per Lluís Graner.

[Les obres apareixen ordenades segons la data de la primera representació dins de la temporada. El recompte de dies en escena indica el nombre de cada període de dies continuats i, a la dreta, el total de dies que l'obra va estar en cartell. Entre parèntesis, els dies totals en escena afegint represes de temporades posteriors. No equivalen, però, al nombre de representacions, que seria major, perquè les obres sovint es representaven en múltiples sessions dins del mateix dia.

Estan categoritzades en: original (producció lírica nova), obra externa (producció lírica encarregada i estrenada prèviament per altra empresa), teatre parlat (obres teatrals catalanes sense música) i traduccions (obres dramàtiques traduïdes d'altra llengua). S'indica, a més, si era una estrena absoluta o si era una represa d'una producció prèvia ja feta per l'empresa.]

[9] Dades i text citat extret del programa general de la inauguració de temporada el 12 d'octubre del 1905 [CDMAE: Reg. 527545].

[10] El text i la música es van escriure i es conserven al fons Pedrell (Biblioteca de Catalunya: M 825), però segons explica el mateix Pedrell al seu epistolari, hauria retirat l'obra per desacords artístics amb l'empresa després de l'estrena de La matinada.

[11] A l'epistolari de Josep Carner podem comprovar que va ser ell l'encarregat de buscar autor per a la música de L'any mil, oferta a Joan Llongueras. L'obra es va concebre en tres quadres: "el 1er, davallada d'un aspre muntanya; cel lívid, captaires, penitents. El 2on, barri miserable; fred, foscor i a la fi un estel de sang travessant el cel. El 3er (únic que hi va lletra), la Catedral. Això ha de durar de 20 a 25 minuts. [...]". Carner va adjuntar a Llongueras la lletra del primer quadre i estava esperant rebre la del tercer, on havia de ser la Cançó de la Sibil·la. El lliurament del text es va endarrerir i l'obra no es va acabar. Es conserven fragments del text a BC: M 5930/8, 11, 12 i la música del primer acte i esborrany del segon a BC: M 5659.

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Nuestro teatro Principal, el de mayores condiciones acústicas y artísticas, el más cómodo y señoril de Barcelona, ha sido durante años refugio de todos los espectáculos que no hallaban albergue en los otros. Muchas veces hemos lamentado que no se le destinase a funciones de carácter permanente, como también que el público barcelonés mostrara hacia él injustificado desvío. No hay que decir, pues, si el Diario ve con satisfacción que al fin una empresa lo haya tomado por su cuenta, con el propósito de hacerlo servir, no con carácter interino, a elevados fines artísticos, relacionados con la depuración del arte escénico, harto acanallado en Barcelona. Los augurios acerca de cuál será el éxito definitivo de esta obra patriótica serían muy aventurados. Hay que contar con el apoyo de cuantos se interesan en que el teatro sea lugar de honesto esparcimiento del espíritu, donde se goce del arte puro, sin pervertir el alma ni los sentidos; pero no debe olvidarse tampoco que la monotonía y el exceso de simplicidad y de ingenuidad, la falta de un vivo interés dramático en el espectáculo diario pueden acabar por reducir el público del Principal en términos que la empresa no pueda sostenerse. Por esto es de aplaudir que se haya decidido reemplazar de cuando en cuando las visiones cinematográficas y escénicas con verdaderas obras dramáticas, las que, es de suponer, se ajustarán, no solo a los fines de perfección artística, sino también a los de depuración moral.

Anteanoche se efectuó la función inaugural, y el público correspondió a los esfuerzos de la empresa, pues el teatro estaba lleno a rebosar. Las proyecciones cinematográficas no podían ser más del agrado del público, ya que pocas veces las había visto de mayor fijeza y limpidez. Las del viaje por los Alpes resultan, además, muy interesantes.

La visión legendaria en cuatro cuadros Lo comte l'Arnau es del mismo género de otras que se habían puesto en la sala Mercè; pero siendo el escenario mayor en el Principal, también se ha podido dar mayores proporciones a la representación.

Las decoraciones resultan de verdadera riqueza artística. La del primer cuadro, pintada por Junyent, es admirable por su colorido armónico y de una gran verdad y por su excelente perspectiva, que da ilusión de realidad a las hermosas montañas y a las nubes que las coronan. La segunda, de los señores Alarma y Moragues, representa un bosque nevado y se distingue por su idealidad y por la suavidad exquisita del colorido. La del señor Urgellès, correspondiente al tercer cuadro, suponemos que no estaría anteanoche terminada, pues produjo escasa ilusión y además se presentó en pésimas condiciones, ya que se veían las luces de las bambalinas, y desde cerca de los pasillos laterales los balconcillos de la tramoya. La última, del señor Vilomara, es excelente, y el cuadro plástico que aparece en el fondo, al final del cuadro, de una delicadeza admirable. Por el decorado es, pues, le «visión legendaria» del teatro Principal digna de loa y de ser vista por todo Barcelona.

Pero no le van en zaga, en cuanto al mérito, ni la letra ni la música. No podía el señor Carner dar grandes vuelos a su producción literaria, atendidas las dimensiones de la obra; pero la ha impregnado de poesía fresca y jugosa. La música tiene la vehemencia y la inspiración varonil que suele dar a toda su producción artística el maestro Morera. No obstante, algunos fragmentos encantan por su tierna delicadeza

En conjunto, la visión El comte l'Arnau tiene un defecto: la brevedad. Cuando el público empieza a gustar las bellezas ópticas y acústicas de un cuadro, les pone término la aparición relampagueante del terrible héroe popular y el descenso inmediato del telón, con lo que el espectáculo deja en el alma la impresión de algo que ha tocado el paladar, mas no ha podido saborearse; una impresión fugitiva, que no satisface.

El teatro Principal descubre el cambio de inquilino, no solo por dentro, sino también por fuera. Se presenta remozado y en la fachada ostenta un friso de estilo clásico, de buen gusto y con una profusión de luces eléctricas de diversos colores que atraen las miradas y los pasos de cuantos andan por las Ramblas de Santa Mónica y del Centro."

Diario de Barcelona 273 (16/10/1905), p. 11219.

"Jo sempre havia cregut que donar duros a quatre pessetes era gairebé un impossible metafísic. Però l'obertura de la campanya Graner al Principal m'ha tret de semblant horror, que deia aquell. No diré que en Graner els hi dongui, però si que realitza un problema potser més difícil i tot. Perquè mirin que donar per trenta o quaranta cèntims un espectacle tan brillant i tan artístic com El comte l'Arnau, és cosa gairebé miraculosa. Allò sí que és tota una esplendidesa.

Lletra molt inspirada d'en Josep Carner, música d'en Morera tan inspirada com la lletra, decoracions superbes d'en Junyent, en Moragas i l'Alarma, l'Urgellès i en Vilomara i un servei de perruqueria que no hi ha més que demanar. [...]

En fi, demanin. Figurin-se que per a que no hi falti res fins al final el comte fa uns jocs amb la capa que ni Miss Fuller. I tot fa tan ben conjuminat, baix la direcció general d'en Graner i l'escènica d'en Gual, que ha demostrat un cop més que d'aquestes coses en sap alguns nius.

Virolet."

Cu-cut! 199 (19/10/1905), pp. 663–664.

"Sorprèn i meravella que un argument tan simple com el del Comte l'Arnau hagi donat pasta per a fer-ne tan hermoses creacions. No s'ha distret pas el Sr. Graner en la tria dels principals elements. Ha cercat gent jove i ja sancionada. Tots s'hi han posat de ple i han interpretat la importància del projecte amb tot l'interès que reclama.

En Carner, jove entre els joves i vell entre els vells dels nostres lletrats, ha sabut amb inspirada lletra fer de la llegenda del Comte l'Arnau quatre quadros magnífics i d'un sabor llegendàriament modernitzat i expertament senyorial i d'antigor que, tot honorant-lo una vegada més, ha donat lloc a que el mestre Morera brodés la llegenda amb unes harmonies i efectes musicals que acaben per entusiasmar el públic que ho contempla, i als pintors els hi ha inspirat motius escènics de natura, los més sorprenents.

La part decorativa és verament esplendent, mereixent tota mena d'aplaudiments llurs artistes [...] El simpàtic Sr. Lambert interpreta la galana partitura d'en Morera i arrastra sa batuta serenament moguda per aquell devessall de notes de les tempestats del pas del fantàstic Comte l'Arnau, la gran orquestra que hi dirigeix. El Sr. Lambert és també jove, molt jove, però amb un coratge de mestre que és una esperança de la pàtria.

En Gual, que hi posa sa ànima d'artista, ha fet dels seus actors els més autèntics personatges de la llegenda. [...] movent-se dintre aquelles escenes amb tota l'artística naturalitat que es requereix, amb llurs vestuaris esplèndids d'època i lloc, honrant de veres la direcció d'en Gual. Respecte la caracterització de la Comtesa i del Comte l'Arnau [...] duen l'art més exquisit en compenetració i es produeixen amb tota perfectibilitat, valent ells sols un elogi refinadíssim, així com també la visió de les tres filles del Comte, que són l'acabament de la perfecció d'aquest quadro plàstic [...].

[...] Cal així mateix elogiar el nostre poble, que amb son contingent i entusiasme demostra tenir encara gust i sentit pràctic per les obres de veritable cultura i sà patriotisme. Així serà com d'una corrambada es quedarà nu i vern al mig del llot lo xorc teatre, i el poble enfortirà més i més amb la moral i el bon art català.

"L'èxit de la inauguració dissabte passat va ésser gran. La visió llegendària El comte l'Arnau, lletra d'en Carner i música d'en Morera, agradà força. En Junyent, en Moragas, l'Alarma, l'Urgellès i en Vilomara havien pintat els quatre quadros de què es compon la visió i totes, tant per la justesa de colorit com per la perspectiva i la veritat d'època mereixen els elogis de tothom. Naturalment que aquest luxo ajuda a fer l'obra més important, però en conjunt resulta magnífica. [...]

"No anàvem pas errats al suposar que la campanya d'en Graner al Principal seria una campanya de cultura. Per circumstàncies que no hem d'escatir, la gent s'ha llançat d'algun temps ençà als espectacles de durada curta i preu modest. Doncs, la primera tasca d'en Graner ha estat la d'aixecar aquests espectacles fins a les condicions de lo veritablement artístic. I veus-aquí que el seu primer intent ja ha aconseguit un aire de cosa excepcional, de aquelles que senyalen una tongada en la vida d'un teatre. Quan El Comte l'Arnau no es faci, és ben segur que molts, en parlar del Principal d'avui, diran: «aleshores que s'hi feia El Comte l'Arnau...»

I és que en aquesta obreta líric llegendària s'hi feren d'una manera tan perfecta tots els components, que l'efecte total resulta el d'una cosa imaginada i realitzada per un talent únic, acoblador de distints talents. La lletra d'en Carner és plena de caràcter, donant una bona impressió d'edat mitjana, però la música d'en Morera acaba de fer-la assaboridora, acompanyant d'harmonies tendres les situacions tendres, d'harmonies tràgiques les situacions tràgiques, d'harmonies feréstegues les situacions feréstegues.

I un cop s'han fos lletra i música, seguint sempre paral·lelament les pujades i baixades de l'acció, venen els escenògrafs i completen l'obra donant-li un ambient adequat, digne de l'hermosa llegenda que serveix de base a lletra i música. En Junyent, en el primer quadro, ha fet una decoració simpàtica d'entonació, vibrant de llum i composta amb exquisida elegància; en Moragas i l'Alarma, en el segon, presenten un hermosíssim bosc d'avets que és un tour de force de perspectiva i una hermosura de color; en Vilomara, en el quart i últim, mostra un cop més les seves superbes qualitats, produint un interior de castell elegantíssim de línies i ric de color. I tant el treball dels escenògrafs com el del poeta i el del músic han trobat un bon complement en la interpretació, que resulta bona per part de tots els artistes que hi prenen part.

M. i G."

La Ilustració catalana 125 (22/10/1905), p. 686.

"«Està bé, està bé; molt bonic!» Això diu tothom en sortir de veure El comte l'Arnau. Quatre decoracions, tres d'elles (primera, segona i quarta, d'en Junyent, Moragas i Alarma i Vilomara respectivament) esplèndides de color, llum, de fantasia, i una (la tercera, de l'Urgellès) carrinclona, de castell de cartes; ermitans, pastors, soldats, mals esperits i un comte a dalt de cavall que fa por, tres filles que filen dintre la boira, una mare que resa, llamps i trons... música descriptiva, mitjanament descriptiva, i versos; versos d'en Carner, el poeta [...]

Tot això amb canviants de llum ben dirigits, constitueixen l'espectacle-audició El comte l'Arnau, que està bé, molt bé, molt bonic i res més. Del comte l'Arnau de la llegenda, zero. Sols és gran, sols és dolent per a espantar criatures. Jo i molts com jo que no són criatures ens en havíem format una altra imatge, una altra idea del comte l'Arnau. De tots modos està bé, molt bé, molt bonic! [...]

Emili Tintorer"

Joventut 298 (26/10/1905), p. 689.

"Amb El comte l'Arnau s'han inaugurat en aquest teatre els Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Inspirant-se en la popular llegenda catalana, ha imaginat en Josep Carner quatre quadros que, sense el lligam d'una acció desenrotllada, ja que són simplement episòdics, posen de relleu amb vigor la malèfica personalitat del Comte, fi que, sens dubte, s'havia proposat en Carner i que ha assolit molt ensopegadament. Res direm de la poesia, que no és pas aquesta la nostra missió. A nostre entendre, l'avalora una gran qualitat, i és el caient popular.

A en Morera, l'autor de la música, l'assumpte li ha escaigut verament. El seu estil vigorós, que en l'ocasió present arriba a voltes fins a ésser justament llampant, hi quadra de debò en els moments culminants a l'aparèixer el Comte l'Arnau amb el seu seguici de Mals Esperits. I això no vol pas dir que, quan la situació ho demana, no hagin brollat de sa ploma notes de tendresa. La cançó de las filles del Comte, en l'últim quadro, és d'una frescor suavíssima, d'una ingenuïtat que encanta i d'una força de contrast tan ben trobada, abans i després de la fatídica cançó popular, que pot ben dir-se que aquest darrer quadro és el que més impressió causa musicalment parlant. I es també que l'efecte ja ve preparat des del començament de l'obra, ja que, excepció feta de l'apacible tocada de flabiol del pastor en el segon quadro, les tintes són, en general, ombrívoles, quan no feréstegues.

Felicitem a en Morera, que ha sabut trobar per a tota l'obra la nota justa, sense enfarfecs de saviesa i sense caure en lo excessivament vulgar, i felicitem també a en Graner, al gran artista, per la feliç inauguració de l'obra educativa que amb tanta abnegació s'ha emprès."

Ressenyes de premsa:

"La Fustots es una producción inocente y candorosa, verdaderamente propia para niños de corta edad, que tuvo el mérito especial de promover la hilaridad de la concurrencia, seguramente contra la voluntad del autor. Indudablemente, la mise en scene es muy superior al libro, lo que pone una vez más de relieve los desvelos y el buen gusto del señor Graner en tratar las obras como empresario inteligente y ganoso del favor del público. Lástima que sus sacrificios se estrellen en otras circunstancias de orden ajeno a su voluntad e iniciativa.

La decoración muy armónica, obra del señor Urgellès, produce muy buen efecto, así como los efectos de luz del fondo, al representarse plásticamente la rondalla. En esta obrilla se han intercalado unos fragmentos de Schumann, no sabemos atinar a santo de qué, pudiéndose haber escrito música original y apropiada al asunto.

En suma, La Fustots, si como obra teatral no puede tomarse en serio, agregada al cinematógrafo proporcionará seguramente buenas entradas."

La Publicidad (21/10/1905), edición mañana, p. 2.

"[...] (entrada-butaca quasi a un duro, i dic això per a que comprenguí que el públic era fi i moral com l'espectacle) [...] la rondalla popular, també en un acte, portada al teatre per en Sever de la Cantonada (?), La Fustots.

També estaria bé si no fos la decoracíó de l'Urgellès, que fa parella amb l'altra d'El comte l'Arnau, i si no fossin aquelles oques, pobres oques quals ales estiraven de dintre amb cordes de pou, sens dubte per a fer-nos entendre que eren oques amb trampa. Com que al final de la rondalla es transformen les cinc oques en cinc donzelles com cinc sols!

[...] La rondalla, que ve a ésser La venta focs [...] És tan pueril i innocentona la rondalla de La Fustots! [...] En fi, la rondalla de sempre, que fa adormir les criatures cansant-les-hi la imaginació. Quina llàstima que no en siguem tots de criatures encara! En resum, una sessió ensopida, mortalment ensopida.

Serà precursora d'altres? [...] Perquè és molt trist i en fa esvanir moltes d'esperances això que està passant al Principal. Un home es presenta que és artista de consciència i bona fe. Aquest home té diners i vol exposar-los fent art. Voleu res més lloable? No sembla el primer pas per a la regeneració i enaltiment de l'art dramàtic català? Doncs res d'això, i sabeu per què? Perquè aquest home, en Graner, és un home moral. Un home moral! Posem-nos a jeure, quina son! Un home moral sols admet coses antigues, coses ja consagrades o coses modernes que siguin fetes a tall de les antigues, puig la similitud les consagra també. I després molta imaginació, molta fantasia, [...] contes per a quitxalla, molts versos buits, moltes paraules boniques, molt espetec de colors i molts somnis bells, molta ingenuïtat, molta candidesa...

Un home moral ens fa La Fustots prenent-nos per criatures. Sortosament, no en som i ens en riurem de les seves oques blanques. I ell no compren que tenim motiu per a riure'ns-en. Perquè nosaltres, homes immorals, [...] després hem vist que no n'hi ha de prínceps blaus i que el menjar sempre confitura embruta el ventrell. [...]

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Ara mateix [en Graner] ens ha ofert La matinada, que és un quadro de naturalesa d'allò més fi. Figurin-se que se senten unes músiques que un no sap d'on venen, acompanyant uns cants d'en Gual. I s'obre la cortina... I apareix un paisatge alegre, il·luminat per les primeres lluïssors de l'alba. I ¡pam! ¡pam! ¡pam! Aplaudiments a en Junyent, autor de la decoració.

Després comencen a passar figures estilitzades d'allò més decoratives, amb uns vestits més macos que tothom i unes túniques més ben posades que Judas... I aquelles figures figura que són els homes i les dones despertats per la matinada, que avançant... avançant, com ho indica perfectament la claror en augmentar-se i en tenyir el cel de porpra... un cel vibrant de resplendors que es reflecteixen en les aigües que es veuen al lluny.

I vinguin més figures, i totes tan entonades amb el fons i totes escampant flors a una banda i altra ¡amb aquella alegria! Es l'enjoiament de la terra per a rebre dignament el dia que ve... Y si sembren flors pel camí és perquè els homes el trobin ple de joia i sentin la poesia de la activitat, que és la que ha inspirat a en Graner pera compondre aquell espectacle tan hermós, que fa amable la vida y saborosa la feina.

Pera acabar-ho d'adobar, la cosa acaba amb el pas d'una remada de bens de debò que es veu que han d'estar molt ben ensenyats perquè interpreten el seu paper amb el mateix ajust que si en tota la seva vida no hagessin fet altra cosa que rodar-pels escenaris.

Però quan s'ha clos la cortina, encara ve una nova gotellada de música que sembla que ploguin notes. Se veu que el mestre Pedrell havia pres arrencada i li recava deixar la feina. Finalment sona l'última nota y ve un xàfec d'aplaudiments [...].

"[...] Total, cinc o sis minuts d'espectacle. Quadro d'en Graner: quinze o vint persones entre homes, dones i nens que passen aturant-se, fent genuflexions, deixant anar flors i herbes per terra i fent gestos estranys; cinc bens autèntics que també passen sense fer res ni dir re ni tan sols bèèèè... i la llum del sol que comença a sortir... per ponent, vull dir pel costat de les bateries de l'avant-escena. I res més. S'hi deu haver trencar el cap en Graner.

[...] Decoració d'en Junyent: molt bonica. Arbres que eren arbres, roques que eren roques, cel que era cel i aigua que era aigua; tot junt combinat amb força fantasia. Magnifica decoració, si servís per alguna cosa. En resum: una decoració més que fa honor als nostres escenògrafs i a un altre espectacle ensopit [...]

"Es tracta de representar plàsticament, decorativament, un estat de naturalesa ajuntant en un tot harmònic els elements diversos que puguin donar la impressió del dia que ve. Remors de vent i xerroteig d'aucellada, fregadís d'ales i simfonies de color. Per a aconseguir aquest fi, en Graner ha demanat ajuda a l'escenografia, a la poesia i a la música. I amb la decoració d'en Junyent, els versos d'en Gual i les notes d'en Pedrell, ha compost el quadro... I ha agafat una colla de figures, les ha idealitzades per medi d'uns abillaments decoratius i les ha fetes passar per entre la llum de l'aurora i els cants que la saluden... I les hi ha fet sembrar flors pel camí que fan, que és el camí del treball [...]

"Darrerament s'ha estrenat el quadro plàstic d'en Graner, titulat La matinada, lletra d'en Gual, música del mestre Pedrell i decorat de l'Oleguer Junyent. Lo més notable de La matinada és, sens dubte, el decorat, en el qual son autor ha fet gala d'un art sorprenent i exquisit; de lletra n'hi ha poca i la música del gran Pedrell és hermosa com tota la seva, però tal volta resulta un xic massa complicada per un quadro tan senzill."

Talia 39 (11/11/1905), p. 4.

"La matinada, visió de naturalesa, és la segona obra lírica que en Graner ens presentà en el seu teatre. Una esplèndida decoració d'en Junyent, una presentació exquisidament plàstica de personatges idealment vestits, unes gradacions de llum que foren l'encant de la vista. Tals són els clements d'exteriorització de què s'ha valgut en Graner pera realitzar la idea d'una visió de natura que de llarg temps barrinava en son cervell.

Mes a la força suggestiva d'aquests elements visibles cal afegir-hi l'orquestra i les veus, elements invisibles, i potser per això encara més suggestius que els altres.

És el mestre Pedrell qui sobre una poesia d'en Gual ha compost la música per a La matinada. El sentiment poètic de la vinguda del nou dia, de la sortida del bon sol, ha inspirat a en Pedrell una música de caràcter quasi místic: és el cant de la multitud que regracia al bon Déu que ens envia l'astre de la llum i de la vida. És un himne en el qual els vells decrèpits i els infants, les donzelles i les mares canten les benefactores gestes del sol.

L'element de caràcter popular hi domina en l'obra d'en Pedrell, de la que no cal detallar-ne les belleses fent-ne un anàlisis. Remarcarem solament un fragment, la Cançó de les noies, que és hermosíssima. Sabem que es publicarà en la Ilustració Catalana, i ho celebrem perquè així podrà ésser més ben apreciada que en el conjunt de l'obra, dintre de la que potser passa un xic desapercebuda."

Revista musical catalana 23 (novembre 1905), p. 218.

"[...] L'afany del truc lumínic el portà [a en Graner] un dia a un mal pas. Per a l'estrena de la visió La matinada, obra sense diàleg però eloqüentíssima de llum, l'argument de la qual consistia en la desfilada d'un ramat de bens autèntics acompanyats d'una comparseria abillada amb una indumentària vagament grega. La passada, lenta i desenrotllada en actituds de fris, es feia davant d'un paisatge clàssic amarat de romàntic realisme, que amagava els coristes que cantaven el cor que era el veritable teló de fons, la perspectiva del qual es perdia en el suavíssim polsim de l'infinit.

Quan tot va estar a punt, en Graner va donar l'ordre d'engegar les llums: —Apagueu aquest blanc i doneu-me el vermell; esmorteïu aquest groc i enrobustiu el verd; rebaixeu el morat, que no s'adiu amb aquesta passada dels baixos del cor; amb aquest trèmol de violins hi vull un espetec de vermell.— En passar els dòcils xais acompanyats dels pseudo-pastors arcadians, el seu neguit es trasmudà en frisança. —No, no —cridava gesticulant entre aquell arc de Sant Martí, les colors del qual s'havien proclamat l'autonomia.— No pot ser: el blanc d'aquests moltons se'm menja la llum, els braços i les sines dels pastors m'embruten el paisatge. Fora, fora! Que els pintin.

Correu cuiteu, sortiren dependents a comprar pintures i ell amb la mateixa febre amb què hauria pintat La pesca a l'encesa o L'enterrament de la sardina, començà de pintar, els braços, les pitreres i les cares dels pastors i els lloms dels moltons amb anilines i purpurines metàl·liques de virolades colors. I tornaren a assajar la desfilada: passaren els xais amb la mateixa resignació d'abans, però amb l'esquena i flancs tintats com joguines mitològiques de grandària natural i els pastors amb reflexes de bronze antic tot amagant una rialleta escèptica. L'home anà donant les darreres pinzellades a homes i animals, i després d'ordenar novament la colorida comitiva, vingué el moment emocionant de descloure la cortina als ulls dels espectadors àvids de plasticitats meravelloses.

La part colorida, humana i animal, havia anat molt bé; els xais havien servat el colorit entre els rulls de la llana; en els pastors, la suor i el fregadís de les robes havien fet aparèixer matisos insospitats i delicades esfumadures. En Graner estava contentíssim de la seva obra. L'endemà, però, se li plantejà un seriós conflicte: els ferrenys pastors, qui més qui menys pares de família, protestaren enèrgicament i es negaren categòricament a sotmetre's a la pintada, al·legant els efectes tòxics de les substàncies utilitzades. Alguns de la colla ja havien sentit l'inici de les desagradables conseqüències del novíssim truc escenogràfic. Davant d'un perill d'aquesta mena, en Graner va consentir que els pastors passessin al natural; però els bens, com que no varen protestar, tornaren a ser pintats, i durant alguns dies, conformats amb llur destí, travessaren l'escenari de l'antic teatre de la Santa Creu complint llur deure sense vanitosa petulància i sense exhalar una queixa ni dibuixar la més lleu protesta. Però abans de treure l'obra del cartell, s'havia mort més de la meitat de la decorativa ramada.

I ara, després d'aquesta digressió barcelonina, tornem als trucs que estrafent els sorolls dels elements de la naturalesa. [...]"

"La presentació de l'obra serà esplèndida; el pintor escenògraf senyor Brunet ha terminat tres decoracions en les que derrotxa a mans plenes la fantasia, la grandiositat i l'efectisme de bona llei. El vestuari és de suma varietat i riquesa."

"Ahir a la tarda va estrenar-se al teatre Principal Lo miracle del Tallat, llegenda de Poblet en tres quadros, que va obtenir extraordinari èxit, essent cridats vàries vegades a escena els senyors Carner i Morera, autors respectivament de la lletra i de la música.

En aquesta obra han demostrat una vegada més la seva esplendidesa i gust artístic. Les decoracions dels tres quadros que han pintat els senyors Brunet i Pous són d'admirable efecte. La música és d'exquisit gust: en conjunt resulta una obra magnífica, per lo qual no dubtem de que l'empresa del teatre Principal ens la deixarà saborejar llarg temps."

"En el teatro Principal se estrenó ayer la composición escénica El miracle del Tallat, letra de D. José Carner, música del maestro Morera y decoraciones de Brunet y Pous. Es una de esas visiones poéticas, especialidad de los Espectáculos-Audiciones Graner, en que se armonizan, para producir efectos de sorprendente idealidad, todas las artes escénicas. Música, letra y decoraciones resultan excelentes; pero la visión no produce en el público la impresión indispensable para entusiasmarlo."

"[…] Salí entristecido por haber perdido la preciosa amistad de Pierrot, y entré para consolarme en el Principal, donde suelen "poner" las obras con más propiedad, excepción hecha de aquellos regocijados gansos de La Fustots, de que hablé en su tiempo. Hiciéronnos un nuevo cuadro plástico, Lo miracle del Tallat, del cual miracle no logré entender gran cosa en esencia, pero que me pareció extraordinariamente vistoso y hábilmente aderezado, sobre todo en el cuadro primero. Morera ha puesto exquisita música a la letra de Carner; Brunet y Pous han pintado tres decoraciones de excelente composición, y Gual y Graner han condimentado todo ello con sabor y gusto.

Si como han hecho este hicieran Gual y Graner, ¡ay de mí!, el miracle de convencer a Pierrot, a mi desventurado amigo Pierrot.

"Ric vestuari, esplèndid decorat, sobre tot en el primer quadro, excel·lent direcció, música delicadíssima com tota la d'en Morera i versos... suposem que correctes, no els entenguérem. "La música casi inmejorable, la letra y el decorado tal vez resulten algo deficientes; este último en algún detalle del tercer cuadro y algún juego de luz del segundo, y algo de falta de propiedad en el primero, que más bien calificaremos de descuido que de defecto, no satisface a las exigencias del público que se había acostumbrado demasiado bien en el Comte l'Arnau.

En la partitura s'hi destaquen alguns números ben distingits, com són la introducció i ballet del primer quadro, un vigorós cor d'homes i unaària de tenor d'un sentiment dramàtic força espontani. "El laureado pintor D. Luis Graner, empresario del teatro Principal, ha logrado otro éxito con la presentación en escena de la leyenda catalana: El miracle del Tallat.

La obra literaria ofrece buenas situaciones para el decorado y para la parte musical, en la que el maestro Morera ha estado feliz e inspirado. El preludio, la danza, la típica canción del muecín, el raconto, el coro de voces celestes y todo el tercer cuadro, de magnífico efecto, son páginas musicales de sincera inspiración trasladadas hábilmente a la orquesta. Otro de los alicientes de la obra fue su presentación escénica, estando las figuras agrupadas y movidas con verdadero arte. El público recibió la nueva producción con extraordinario aplauso."

Ressenyes de premsa:

"La última de las llamadas visiones musicales ofrecidas al público por el señor Graner, en el teatro Principal, titúlase La Nit de Nadal, y se estrenó anteanoche ante concurrencia numerosísima.

Dicha obra, cuya actualidad en la presente época es innegable, constituye un verdadero acierto que parece llamado a proporcionar muy buenas entradas a la empresa del más antiguo de nuestros coliseos.

Tratase de una serie de cuadros que representan escenas conmemorativas de la sagrada noche en que vino al mundo Nuestro Señor Jesucristo. En ellas se enlazan con singular habilidad infantiles detalles de «Nacimiento» con altas concepciones artísticas de una idealidad sorprendente, formando un conjunto en alto grado notable y atractivo no solo para los niños sino también para las personas mayores.

Las cinco decoraciones que para la obra han pintado los distinguidos escenógrafos señores Vilomara y Junyent, y de las cuales son particularmente dignas de mención las que sirven de fondo a los cuadros segundo y cuarto, fueron recibidas por el público con muy justos aplausos, pues, en verdad, son obras de arte modelos de inspiración y de habilidad técnica.

El maestro señor Lamote de Grignon ha sabido interpretar con su música la suave poesía de aquella noche llena de encanto; y aunque su composición tiene algunos fragmentos que pecan de cierta monotonía, en realidad esta se desvanece pronto entre jugosas armonías, llenas unas de reminiscencias religiosas y populares y marcadas otras con el sello característico de inspiración que distingue las producciones de aquel celebrado autor. En conjunto, su trabajo fue también muy aplaudido al final de todos los cuadros, y después del último fue llamado a la escena el señor Lamote, que ya antes de descorrerse la cortina fue objeto de una cariñosa demostración de simpatía.

Sin menoscabar en lo más mínimo el valor de la letra escrita por el señor Casas y Amigó, hay que reconocer que en obras de la naturaleza de la que nos ocupa la parte literaria queda en cierto modo subordinada a los elementos puestos en juego por las demás artes, sobre todo cuando resulta por particularidades de la representación punto menos que ininteligible el texto que se canta.

La presentación escénica fue digna de la acreditada pericia y del gusto artístico del señor Graner, así como del lujo y esplendor a que nos tiene acostumbrados. Los cuadros plásticos fueron de un relieve pocas veces alcanzado: hubo que repetir una sardana que se baila al final del cuadro tercero, y el público no ocultaba la admiración que le produjo la verdad de algunos detalles que de aquellos forman parte."

"[...] La nit de Nadal, basada en la lletra del poema escrit pel malaguanyat Casas i Amigó amb el mateix títol. És realment d'alabar aquesta mena de tribut [...]

La visió es compon de cinc quadros, reproduint cada un d'ells un aspecte de la vida de Jesús. Tots ells són pintorescos i, malgrat la manca d'acció, produeixen un efecte ben agradable, alegrant els ulls i l'esperit per anar acompanyats d'una música realment exquisida i plena de caràcter com poden recordar tots els que varen sentir-la ja fa tres anys a Novetats [...]. En La nit de Nadal és reduïda, però conserva tota la frescor.

La decoració del primer quadro representa un pessebre en el sentit menestral de la paraula: té una gràcia fina que la fa molt agradosa. Entre les altres, mereixen citar-se les dels quadros tercer i quart, totes dues molt enteses de perspectiva.

En conjunt, La nit de Nadal resulta un espectacle popular i distingit a la vegada. Potser si hi hagués una acció seria més interessant per a segons qui [...]

"La lletra, deguda al jove poeta Casas i Amigó, mort ja fa alguns anys per desgracia de nostra literatura, ha donat lloc a desenrotllar cinc hermosos quadros, als quals s'hi ha pogut adaptar unes pagines excel·lents de música del mestre Lamote de Grignon, ja aplaudides per la part de nostre públic aficionat a la música.

Aquesta nova visió musical que en Graner ha donat al públic, és, en conjunt, com totes les altres estrenades fins avui, d'immillorable efecte plàstic: les decoracions dels senyors Junyent y Vilomara. La combinació en les llums, la indumentària, en fi, tot lo de forma en la Nit de Nadal es tractat amb un gust a ne'l que aquí no ens hi tenen avesats. Però sembla que no n'hi hagi prou amb això per a entretenir i commoure a un públic, i és que en Nit de Nadal hi manca un fil a seguir, una acció que es desenrotlli i que, donant unitat als cinc quadros, lligant-los, en fes de tots junts un cos... En tot lo demés, Nit de Nadal és una visió hermosa de contemplar i deliciosa d'escoltar.

"Darrerament, en vigílies de les festes de la Nativitat del Senyor, s'ha estrenat en el mateix teatre una visió musical en cinc quadros, del mestre Lamote de Grignon, lletra d'en Casas i Amigó, La nit de Nadal. L'hermosa obra del mestre Lamote, prou coneguda i estimada per las audicions que va dar-ne l'Associació Musical amb la cooperació de l'Orfeó Català, ha sigut presentada ara baix l'aspecte d'acció dramàtica, logrant en l'escena un èxit extraordinari i més gros si cap que en el concert. L'obra està enquadrada dintre magnifiques decoracions degudes als escenògrafs senyors Vilomara i Junyent.

Quadre I: L'arribada

"Una plaça pública en la vila de Vallflorest de la que n'és sobirà el Rei Franci."

"Una part dels exèrcits del Comtat de Granastre [...] arriben de pas a la vila de Vallflorest i s'hi deturen curta estona per a reposar de la caminada. El poble ho sabia i els rep amb entusiasme i amb mostres de gran joia. Per la porta de la vila, que al fons s'aixeca, compareixen munió de paisans, homes i dones amb branques verdes a les mans [...] festegen als de Granastre, qui arriben victoriosos al so de clarins i tambors, llurs banderes voleiant per l'aire, grans i colorides, i llurs vestits llampants ferint la vist al espetec dels sol. De per tot cauen flors i fulles i per tot s'escampa la joia popular. [...]"

"Repic de campanes i arribada dels soldats [...]" Potser es veu l'església de la plaça.

"Beuen. Un soldat s'enfila damunt d'una taula i amb el vas a la mà canta com si brindés."

Ressenyes de premsa:

"La visión musical Els tres tambors, estrenada en el teatro Principal, tiene por argumento el de la canción popular catalana del mismo título. Con la música inspirada de Morera, las hermosas decoraciones de Moragas y Alarma, el rico vestuario que lucen partes principales y comparsas y el movimiento escénico, resulta muy sugestiva y rica de color. El primer cuadro es animadísimo, genuinamente teatral, desarrollado en un ambiente de verosimilitud escénica muy digna de aplauso. El segundo entra ya en una esfera de idealidad que no se adapta perfectamente a la tradición y al modo de sentir el teatro la mayor parte de los espectadores; mas encanta y atrae por su espléndida decoración, por la poesía que se desprende de la situación y del diálogo y por las ilustraciones musicales. El último reproduce una pequeñísima parte del primero, y, en verdad, la obra poco perdería si se suprimiera, pues produce cierto desencanto encontrarse con la misma decoración, la misma escena y la misma música de un fragmento del primero después de aguardar cinco 6 seis minutos a que se efectúe la mutación. Con haber hecho desfilar a los tambores en el mismo cuadro, tras una breve escena cualquiera, para dar tiempo a prepararse, se ahorraba el gasto y se evitaba la decepción del tercero.

La ejecución no es superior a la presentación escénica, mas sí merecedora de encomio. El tambor príncipe, la princesa y el Rey tienen una interpretación muy aceptable, en especial por parte de la señorita Baró y del señor Giménez. […]"

"Els tres tambors en Gual n'ha sortit airós, eixa obra plaurà a xics i a grans, bona estona de goig poguent embadalir-se sentit la música del mestre Morera. Els aplausos que el públic tributi a la nova producció seran ben merescuts.

Art jove 04 (30/01/1906), p. 71.

"[...] Doncs Blancaflor és com Els tres tambors: una cançó popular fresca i xamosa, joia d'ingenuïtat [...] Els tres tambors és devessall de llum, aplec de colors brillants, migdiada d'estiu, i amb tot, la cançó és ben pariona de l'altra, amb son caient de poble, senzilla i cor-oberta. Si avui aquell públic, primitiu espectador dels primers passos del Teatre Íntim, veiés Blancaflor, l'aplaudiria. [...]

Els tres tambors és una troballa, una d'aquelles troballes que estan reservades sol als artistes. Bé se n'han donades ara al Principal d'ampliacions de cançons populars, bé se n'han glosades de llegendes catalanes; mes, en gairebé totes, quan la grandiositat llegendària no es veia destruïda per l'èmfasi del glosador, la suggestiva simplicitat popular era desnaturalitzada per la carrincloneria o la incoherència de qui s'havia atrevit a posar-hi ses mans.

Res d'això ha succeït amb Els tres tambors, l'antiga cançó tan brillantment harmonitzada per en Morera i avui ampliada per ell en col·laboració amb en Gual. [...] En Gual, a més, ha sabut presentar molt bé l'obra, donant-li un color d'època escaient de bo de bo. Els trajos són rics i de tons alegres [...] i els escenògrafs Moragas i Alarma hi han contribuït també en bona part amb ses dues decoracions, plenes de llum i de color, especialment la que representa la plaça del poble.

La música és brillant i sentida, apareixent en Morera magistral en la instrumentació. [...] Abans d'acabar, no vull estar-me de dir el mal efecte que em produeix veure obres artístiques com Els tres tambors barrejades amb sessions de cinematògraf. Sembla que l'empresari les posi per a distreure la canalla [...] Home, senyor Graner: ¿ha vist mai, vostè que és pintor, que entremig d'una exposició de fotografies s'exhibeixin quadros a l'oli? [...]

J. Pujol i Brull"

Joventut 312 (01/02/1906), pp. 72–73.

"Entre les produccions del seu gènere [...] és tal vegada la més teatral i la que encomana més al públic un sentiment. El petit dramet que s'hi descabdella és senzill, però fa batre el cor. Aquella princesa ferida d'amor pel tambor jove –el que ve de la guerra amb un ram de rosetes– amb tot i ser princesa de cançó, porta en sí la llavor d'una gran tragèdia íntima: –la tragèdia eterna de la diferència de classes oposant-se al expandiment de l'amor. [...]

Els tres quadros de què es compon l'obreta, són tots tres ben vius i ben vistosos i ben pintorescs. L'arribada dels tambors al primer i la despedida a l'últim, resultant d'una animació que s'encomana al públic, afalagat per la música plena de caràcter i expressió que hi ha posat en Morera i per les decoracions lluminoses dels escenògrafs Moragas i Alarma, els qui han fet en totes prodigis de perspectiva.

Pot dir-se que Els tres tambors resulta un espectacle veritablement esplèndid... Una òpera concentrada.

"La nova visió musical Els tres tambors ha sigut presentada amb gran riquesa, com és costum en aquella casa. La popular cançó ha sigut estiregassada per l'Adrià Gual amb bastant encert i molta discreció. Les decoracions, degudes als experts escenògrafs Srs. Moragas i Alarma, són en conjunt i en detall dues obres primoroses. La música, conservant a tota hora l'escaient popular del motiu fonamental, és deliciosa. El vestuari magnífic. Llàstima que el tercer quadro, amb les repeticions del primer, resulti un desencant per al públic!

"Háse estrenado hace poco, un nuevo cuadro musical titulado Els tres tambors, basado en la canción popular catalana del mismo nombre para el cual el Sr. Gual ha ideado una inspirada letra, siguiendo el argumento de la mencionada canción, que la desarrolla en tres cuadros.

El maestro Morera ha compuesto una música airosa, a la vez que sentimental, que glosa también en el canto popular, en la cual ha sido felicísirno en su concepción, siendo llamado varias veces en escena durante muchos días consecutivos al del estreno.

Del decorado, con solo decir que es de los Sres. Moragas y Alarma queda hecho el elogio, pues es de una notable armonización, y lleno de luz y viveza; es quizás de las mejores decoraciones exhibidas durante esta temporada.

El movimiento escénico, muy bien dirigido, por cierto, es como de costumbre presentado con mucha riqueza y esplendidez, siendo muy notable la entrada de tambores en el primer acto, y el cortejo real del segundo.

En general, resulta una obra espléndida, y que el público corona de estruendosos aplausos al terminar el cuadro.

Quadre I: La presó per dins - Moragas i Alarma

"L'escena representa l'interior de la presó amb tot de presoners ajaguts per terra i acorralats pels recons. Un pastor presoner més jovenet que els altres se troba a prop d'una de les reixes del fons. Fa cara de bon noi: se'l veu pensiu i melangiós. [...]"

Quadro II: L'escala dels sospirs - Vilomara i Junyent

[Final del quadre I] "En aquest bell moment l'escena és ràpidament canviada i apareix la presó vista del exterior enfront l'escala dels sospirs d'on davalla la Princesa Marguerida amb sa Dama seguidora, de manera que la segona meitat de la cançó, o sigui la que segueix, se sent defora."

Quadro III: La cambra del baró - Moragas i Alarma

"L'escena és transformada i representa la cambra del Baró, on ell es troba assegut en son sitial voltat dels seus Consellers i examinant les sentencies dels condemnats.[...]"

Quadro IV: Pels carrers - Moragas i Alarma

"[...] L'escena representa un carrer rònec i privat de llum. El poble vaga. Se senten les campanes de la Seu tocar a morts. El dia és núvol i trist. Tothom corre com darrera de l'ombra sinistra de la fatalitat. De cop, una Donzella de pobre condició tota etzarada arriba i diu al temps que a son costat s'arremolinen bon nombre de passants."

Quadro V: Lo predit s'ha complert - Moragas i alarma

"L'escena representa el lloc on han penjat els presoners. A primer terme i ben amunt, les dues forques on hi ha la Princesa i el Pastor penjats, dels qui sols se'n veuen les cames i els peus. Branden els llurs cossos. Cauen flors. Se senten les campanes. Ve el poble arremolinat i ple d'horror."

Ressenyes de premsa:

"La iniciativa del eximio pintor don Lluís Graner se muestra inagotable y ha hallado ahora nueva materia de producción artística, llevando a la escena otra canción popular catalana: La presó de Lleida, de cuya letra se ha encargado el notable literato don Adrià Gual, y de la música, el joven compositor don Jaume Pahissa.

La acción de La presó de Lleida es sombría y angustiosa; no es la más a propósito para una de esas visiones musicales que parecen reclamar luz y expansión, movimiento y vistosidad de indumentaria, mejor que situaciones de desesperación y de dolor álgido o de soluciones irreparables; y a pesar de todo ello, los señores Gual y Pahissa han logrado que su obra interesa desde las primeras escenas y se haga crecientemente sugestiva.

La adaptación, o mejor, la ampliación de la letra, tiene rasgos delicados y escenas muy bien combinadas. La partitura es superior a todo: al argumento y a la presentación escénica. Contiene la obra del señor Pahissa el germen de un verdadero drama musical de factura demasiado elevada para ilustrar un cuadro breve y episódico, y de matices de muy buen gusto, amén de una conexión total en la partitura que revela en su autor excelentes condiciones.

Acaso la erudición musical del concertista haya perjudicado algo a su sinceridad, pues en los fragmentos más sencillos es en donde se mantiene el aroma popular de la tradicional melodía.

El plañidero canto de un grupo de prisioneros:

Ai, el pla de Tarragona, qui et pogués veure d'a prop!
El meu cor bé prou t'enyora, pobre cor!

es de una belleza delicadísima y emocionante.

También es muy bella la canción del pastor, que conserva toda la rústica ingenuidad del canto popular, de aquel canto saturado de amorosa añoranza.

La partitura que ha compuesto el señor Pahissa tiene, pues, condiciones de obra muy bien pensada y bien resuelta.

Cuanto a la presentación escénica, no hay que decir si será cuidada e interesante sabiendo que, bajo la dirección de los señores Graner y Gual, han colaborado escenógrafos tan expertos como los señores Vilomara, Junyent, Moragas y Alarma.

El público, que llenaba por completo el teatro, hizo salir repetidas veces a los señores Gual y Pahissa."

La Vanguardia (16/03/1906), p. 9.

"[...] La presó de Lleida constituye uno de los grandes éxitos de la temporada, y cada día va en aumento el público que acude a ver esta notable producción, que bien puede calificarse de ópera condensada, pues la inspiración, unidad, esmerada labor orquestal y grandiosidad de la música, la riqueza del decorado, el lujo y propiedad de la indumentaria, el movimiento y combinación de las figuras en cada uno de los cuadros, dan, sin duda, aquel carácter a la producción da los señores Gual y Pahissa. La canción popular catalana ha sido armonizada admirablemente por este último, sin hacerle perder en un ápice su color especial y aumentando su sugestionabilidad.

El desarrollo escénico es acertado y algunos de sus fragmentos tienen no escaso valor literario. En cuanto a las decoraciones, la segunda y la última son de las más hermosas que se han exhibido en el Principal. En aquella, los muros de la cárcel producen ilusión completa de realidad y su aspecto sombrío forma hermoso contraste con la escala de los suspiros y la vegetación y les flores del otro lado. La del cuarto acto, con el andamiaje de las horcas en primer término, las torres de la ciudad en el fondo y su cielo intensamente rojo, produce un afecto verdaderamente terrorífico. No es extraño que una producción en la cual se han combinado tan estrecha y hábilmente todas las artes escénicas para lograr un conjunto tan hermoso, tan poético y tan rico de expresión atraiga tanta concurrencia y sea aplaudida con tanto entusiasmo."

Diario de Barcelona 78 (19/03/1906), pp. 3388–3389.

"Al Principal s'ha estrenat una altra visió musical, glosa d'una sentidíssima cançó catalana: La presó de Lleida. L'èxit ha sigut gran, si bé no tant com el de Els tres tambors. La lletra és d'en Gual, qui ha desenrotllat amb traça i sentiment els principals episodis de la cançó popular. La música és d'en Pahissa, i encara que ella, amb les decoracions, fou lo que més frappà, no deixarem de consignar nostra impressió de que la partitura, tal volta per lo carregat de la instrumentació, en conjunt no resulta massa encaixada. Els intel·ligents aplaudiren al músic, creiem que amb justícia. Nosaltres, reconeixent sos mèrits, hem de dir que una cosa és un drama líric i altra la glosa de una senzilla cançó popular en la forma en que aquestes ens són servides al Principal.

Nostres cançons són flors delicadíssimes que es poden malmetre fàcilment: cal collir-les amb molt de compte per a que no perdin bellesa ni aroma. Són tan ingènues, que en les mans dels ingenus es on hi escauen millor; i tant més gran ens sembla l'artista, en aquest gènere, com més sap identificar-se amb les ingenuïtats corprenedores dels cants populars, amb els quals, amb la major simplicitat, pot arribar-se fins a produir impressions tràgiques. En Pahissa, doncs, si ha pecat, ha sigut per carta de més. S'ha revelat un nou músic, amb més coneixements que molts altres de fama ja consagrada. Li manca ara desposseir-se d'enfarfecs i educar son sentiment, i anirà lluny i no haurà pas de recular ni davant d'obres líriques de més empenta que La presó de Lleida.

Les cinc decoracions de Vilomara, Moragas, Alarma i Junyent, molt artístiques i d'efecte. Tots mereixen els aplaudiments rebuts, i molt especialment en Graner per sa esplendidesa com a empresari artista, i en Gual com a director d'escena, per més que els modests actors del Principal, amb llurs poques facultats, no sempre estigueren a la deguda altura. […]

Joventut 319 (22/03/1906), p. 184.

"Sense reserves pot dir-se que aquest espectacle ha constituït l'èxit de la temporada.

L'adaptació escènica de la cançó popular està feta amb verdadera consciència artística i amb la sobrietat que requereix el gènere. La música és una glossa admirablement feta del motiu de la cançó, sense que caigui mai en lo trivial ni en lo monòton sus bé i tema cabdal està vestit amb una orquestració esplèndida que posa al senyor Pahissa al costat dels nostres primers mestres en al tècnica instrumental.

Els autors foren aplaudidíssims el dia de l'estrena i continuen sent-ho a cada representació. Per als cinc quadros que consta l'obra han pintat hermoses decoracions els escenògrafs senyors Moragas, Alarma, Vilomara i Junyent, sobresortint les corresponents als quadros segon i quint, justíssimes de colorit i sobre tot d'ambient.

El Poble català 72 (24/03/1906), p. 4.

"Salvant la petita, però encertada, col·laboració d'en Gual, podem dir que entre el poble i el jove mestre en Jaume Pahissa han fet una obra artística d'un notable valor intrínsec tant com d'una importància cabdal en el camí d'evolució de l'art català.

Com deu ésser content ara nostre delicat poeta n'Adrià Gual veient realitzar-se en bona part el seu lluminós somni del teatre popular a Catalunya! Com n'estem tots contents de que un empresari amb prou bon gust i llarguesa ens obri un camí regenerador per l'escena catalana! I tant que el necessita el nostre teatre l'empelt d'una saba nova i vigorosa! Una saba que, circulant per ses venes i arteries, li esvaeix tot l'alè de pitarrisme que encara respira sota la disfressa moderna, una saba pròpia que el guardi per sa feblesa actual del perill d'un insípid exotisme, una saba qui li dongui joventut i vida connexes amb la pròpia modalitat del poble qui l'ha de sostenir i amb la vida esplendent de l'art i la poesia; això li cal al nostre teatre per assolir un fi amplament moralitzador i artístic. Per això tant com considerem desencertada la tasca d'implantació d'un gènere germà bessó del género chico castellà[24], tenim per cosa altament lloable la consagració damunt l'escena d'un gènere essencialment oposat a l'anterior, i la naixença del qual en el malaguanyat Teatre Líric fou objecte d'una honrosíssima rebentada[25]. Des de llavors ençà, i obeint als trontolls amb què marxen totes les coses de nostra terra, tot ha evolucionat amb certa violència, i els gustos del públic no han sigut agents en aquesta evolució. Entre els mateixos que endreçaven sàtires punyents als de l'«Íntim» quants n'hi havia qui ostentaven en llurs clatells el signe característic de l'intel·lectualisme! Mes a la fi el camí es va esbrossant, i tant com els gustos del públic van modificant-se, va creixent el nombre d'artistes catalans amb prou forces per col·laborar a la noble tasca de recollir la poesia popular i convenientment ornada amb les gales de totes les arts, retornar-la al poble qui la produí, després de recórrer un cicle de refinament i d'humanisme.

Un exemple palès d'aqueixa tasca el tenim amb el quadro musical superbament descrit per en Pahissa en La presó de Lleida, damunt el fons tràgicament simple de la cançó popular. No manca qui ha trobat que en Pahissa s'era eixit dels límits naturals que l'assumpte imposava, que s'hauria tingut de reduir a glossar la cançó i que allò no és una glossa, sinó que la cançó no és més que un episodi d'aquell poema musical. És ben cert això darrer, però ben lluny de nosaltres admetre la impugnació que damunt aquest fet se faci a l'autor. Cert que la cançó queda com un episodi de la trama simfònica de tota l'obra; mes tal volta, nostres cançons populars, sobretot eixes més hermoses com La presó de Lleida, La filla del marxant i El comte Arnau no poden obtenir en nostra escena més que l'honor d'una senzilla glossa? És que es té de deturar aquí la tasca del poeta i del músic? No veieu, en això, oh, enamorats del nostre art popular, un camí d'evolució progressiva que ens pot dur ben lluny en la realitat d'una nova visió escènica, no hi veieu un camí poc explorat encara per arribar al drama líric català amb propi esforç, amb elements propis?

[24] "Com a tipo d'aqueix género chico català, que algun tems semblà ésser l'ideal de certa gent intel·lectual, hi considerem aquella infelicíssima xavacanada que en diuen La reina del cor." (Nota de l'autor)

[25] "Blancaflor, cant popular harmonitzat per a l'escena, estrenat amb fracàs la nit del 30 de gener de 1899 en lo Teatre Líric de Barcelona, sessió VI del Teatre Íntim.—Barcelona. Impremta y litografia de Joseph Cunill Sala, Universitat, 7, -1904." (Nota de l'autor)

No ha fet menys que això l'il·lustre compositor alemany Humperdinck amb una rondalla, encisadora per cert, però sense l'interès dramàtic, millor dit, tràgic, de la nostra cançó.

Temps enrere vaig veure anunciat que en Gual havia escrit tot un drama en tres actes sobre La presó de Lleida; alguns versos d'aquell drama deuen haver servit per vestir les escenes de la visió que es presenta al teatre Principal, però quin goig faria veure tot un drama, això que diuen un drama, una obra grossa, en tres actes, escrita per un poeta prenent peu d'aquella feta tràgica que conta el poble! [...] Doncs, ho veieu com els nostres poetes hi somien amb les cançons populars per fer obres d'empenta, obres grosses?

Així és com creiem un xic en la regeneració del Teatre català, sobre tot en la del nostre teatre líric, quan ixen deixebles com en Pahissa, qui es posa a l'alçada dels bons mestres. [...]

Acabaré senyalant aquesta obra com un pont per arribar a lo que tant és de desitjar –el nostre drama líric– i recomanant a tota la gent de bon gust que vaig a sentir-la, o parlant més pròpiament, que vagi a veure-la, i als que hi són anats que hi tornin, que no els doldrà. Potser voldrà trobar algú en algun moment d'aquesta partitura tal o qual defecte d'inexperiència, certament excusable, però hi veurà d'un cap a l'altre una gran força de compositor, verdadera grapa de músic, i sentirà rajar dels instruments i de les veus el fruit de la inspiració en fresques melodies, o en acords patètics i combinacions sinistres de sons, seguint sempre els replecs de l'acció. Sobretot aquella cançó, que alguns han presa per popular, ¡ay, el pla de Tarragona! és una verdadera troballa, com ho és el petit preludi del quart quadro, i com ho són tantes altres coses que ja haurà observat l'espectador atent i que observarà segurament aquell qui encara no hagi vist aqueixa esplèndida visió tràgica que ens presenta l'empresa Graner, i que per això mereix junt amb en Gual i en Pahissa l'encoratjament i l'enhorabona més fervents.

"[...] En el mateix teatre continuen els Espectacles-Audicions Graner amb un repertori constantment renovat. Després d'Els tres tambors, amb música d'en Morera, s'ha donat La presó de Lleida, visió musical sobre la cançó popular, lletra d'en Gual i música del jove compositor Pahissa, que ha obtingut un èxit no menys senyalat que l'anterior obreta. Amb aquestes visions van alternant algunes obres del teatre líric català, representades anys enrere en el Tívoli, però que el públic rep amb el mateix agrado que llavors. Són les musicades per en Morera, La barca, L'alegria que passa, esdevinguda força popular, La Rosons i La reina del cor, i la d'en Granados, Picarol. La presentació i el desempeny d'aquestes obres i quadrets són verament notables per l'encert i bon gust que hi presideix."

"Esta unión musical, que como decía muy bien el Diario de Barcelona, es una ópera condensada, pues su argumento inspirado en la canción popular y su notable música son propias para ello; se desarrolla en la escena, en 5 cuadros, con una letra inspiradísima del conocido poeta Adrián Gual, y revestidos estos por otras tantas decoraciones de los célebres escenógrafos Vilomara, Junyent y Moragas y Alarma, llenas de unas perspectivas y un carácter dignas de elogio e impregnadas las unas de un sabor melancólico y tétrico y las otras de poesía y de luz. Una música sentimental del maestro Pahissa da una expresión muy notable a todos los cuadros que terminan con una emocionante salva de aplausos por parte del público, que no hace más que acabar esta notable visión, obra de célebres artistas.

"Jaume Pahissa

Ja en poden passar d'anys; ja podria viure per sempre més separat de l'amic, de l'artista, sense conèixer ni sols sentir parlar mai de les seves obres futures, amb quines ell se deu mostrar conqueridor de nova glòria, que jo en ma solitud i allunyament del gran món sempre tindria un cor de poeta per recordar La presó de Lleida, lo poema musical amb quin se'm va revelar en Pahissa com un raig de llum en una regió tenebrosa.

La presó de Lleida despertà en mi fonda emoció i a tot moment guardo gravat a la memòria el record d'aquell dia que per primera vegada vaig sentir executar l'obra de l'amic Pahissa, qui fins llavors m'havia sigut desconegut, com, sense dubte, m'ho són encara avui molts joves de gran fe que treballen en silenci, i amb quins tal vegada demà faré coneixença i amigablement ens podrem donar la mà per seguir junts amb més coratge la via que ens va traçant lo destí. [...]

Quan a l'ombra de la presó, en aquell lloc de tristesa, on l'home esclau se sent torturat pel més gran dolor recordant lo goig de llibertat del seu temps passat, on la idea del mal s'esvaneix i el sentiment del cor desperta per lo bé, oïu aquell cant d'amor que s'enlaira a través dels ferros de la reixa, no reconeixeu amb aquelles notes lo clam més profund i just de l'ànima humana? Jo, en veritat, el reconec; sempre he considerat i sentit les penes dels presos, agermanant-me amb ells. Jo també tinc un cant inspirat en la llegenda de la Presó de Lleida, un cant que els esclaus entonen a l'escarceller i a la seva filla, que al veure-la hermosa i somrient li diuen, en lo final: [...]

Això ho he anat recordant novament, després d'haver sentit la gran obra d'en Pahissa: és un moment d'inspiració de molt temps enrere que m'omple de goig, celebrant lo triomf del músic poeta amb qui m'he sentit germà de sentiments al comunicar-nos ambdós amb franca amistat. [...] I, per fi, amics meus, sabeu com us revelarà la seva fonda admiració l'autor de La presó de Lleida, com penetrareu en son cor de jove enamorat i somniador? Parleu-li dels musics i dels poetes alemanys, sobretot dels poetes.

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

Quadre I: Riquilda — Moragas i Alarma

"Cor d'àngels des de les alçaries." "Cor de diables des de les fondàries, alternant i junt amb el dels àngels."

"A la fi dels cors s'ouen febles i misteriosos tocs de campana i una mica abans de descorre la cortina apareixent la cova de Fra Garí a Montserrat. Fra Garí està agenollat i torna en si de son èxtasi a les remors d'una cavalcada que s'apropa; avança escoltant. S'ouen ressonar a la vora les trompes del corteig, els cavalls renillen, dringuen les armes i s'ou també remor de gent."

"Sons de trompes. Fra Garí i Riquilda s'esguarden: ell la mena respectuosament vers la cova. Se corre la cortina."

Quadre II: La mort — Moragas i Alarma

"S'obre la cortina i apareix la mateixa decoració anterior. És de nit. Tempesta propera. S'acosten remors infernals."

[26] El 1892, Tomás Bretón estrena l'òpera Garín o l'eremita di Montserrat, en 4 actes i amb llibret de Cesare Fereal, basat en l'obra El Monserrate, de Cristóbal de Virués, que segueix la mateixa llegenda que el Fra Garí de Viura i Morera.

[27] Anunciada inicialment com a Garí, en 3 quadres.

“Arriba a la fi del cor un escamot de bruixots i bruixes, amb bocs, escombres fantàstiques, etc.” “Dansant follament.” “De sobte esclata un llamp seguit d’un tro, s’alça una flamarada i apareix al mig de la dansa el Diable; tots es prosternen.”

“Esclata altre llamp, s’ou altre tro, s’aixeca uns moments una flamarada i d’entre el fum n’apareix el Diable disfressat d’ermità. A la claror d’un altre llamp s’ovira a Fra Garí eixint de la cova i baixant tambalejant amb les mans al cap i en gran desesper. [...]”

“El Diable treu una aixida de rera una roca i cava una fossa apressadament.” “A la claror d’un llamp s’ovira a Fra Garí baixant de la cova amb el cos de Riquilda: el vestit blau d’aquesta és un xic tacat de sang i sa llarga cabellera rossa penja.” “[...] Ambdós enterren prest a Riquilda.”

“Quan Fra Garí i el diable acaben de cobrir la fossa, servint-se del mateix càvec, s’ouen tocs mortuoris de campana [...] S’alça una gran flamarada i fum i d’entre mig el Diable apareix tal com és.”

“Fra Garí s’ajup desesperat sobre la fossa i esclata la tempesta.” “El diable s’enfonsa amb gran terratrèmol.” “Se corre la cortina ràpidament.”

Quadre III: La cacera Vilomara

“S’obre la cortina i apareix un espessíssim bosc de boixos a Montserrat. Fra Garí tornat com bèstia pastura entre matolls. S’ouen remors de cacera. Sons de trompa graduals i repercutint. Fra Garí escolta. Les remors s’apropen amb lladrucs de gossos, etc.”

“De sobte una gran fressa entre els boixos i apareix el seglar qui passa ràpidament seguit de gossos i de munters qui amb destrals s’obren pas entre mates; aprestant les ballestes fan sonar les trompes de caça.”

“Cacen a Fra Garí amb llaços escorredors. Mes fressa i sons de trompes; qualques munters guaiten entre els boixos.” “Se corre la cortina [...]”

Quadre IV: El bateig Vilomara i Junyent

“S’obre la cortina i apareix una sala en el palau dels Comtes de Barcelona. El Comte i Dames i Caballers són asseguts a la taula del festí amb patges, donzelles, etc. Al costat del seient comtal hi ha en un bressol daurat el fillet dels Comtes.”

“Qualques patges van a cercar a Fra Garí i el porten prest lligat amb una cadena.” “Entre la sorpresa de tots, Fra Garí s’aixeca i li cauen les pells que el cobrien.” “Se clou la cortina”

Quadre V: La resurrecció Moragas i Alarma

“S’obre la cortina i apareix la mateixa decoració dels quadres I i II, tota transformada en primavera. La tomba de Riquilda està coberta de rosers. Una bella claror d’auba omple l’ambient. Se sent remor d’un corteig qui s’apropa.”

“Arriben els Comtes de Barcelona i Fra Garí amb seguici fastuós i una colla de Donzelles endolades.”

“Els soldats se disposen a arrencar els rosers.” “Riquilda apareix radiant d’entre els rosers que s’han obert. [...] El fons va omplint-se de llum i de boires rosades.”

“Gran apoteosi. Apareixen àngels amb guirlandes voltant a Riquilda, qui queda tota nimbada de llum [...]” “Se corre la cortina”

Inventari de Lluís Graner al teatre Principal:

“Selva. 3 rompiments i forillo, 3 fermes grans de roques i flors, 2 practicables grans, 8 fermes de rosers, 1 foro de vidrieres”.

Ressenyes de premsa:

“El dissabte de Glòria en Graner ens donà una nova visió musical, Fra Garí, lletra d’en Xavier Viura, música de l’Enric Morera, que obtingué l’èxit més afalagador.

L’exquisit poeta en Xavier Viura ha glossat la ben coneguda llegenda montserratina amb força traça, com era d’esperar, i ha donat a la seva obreta aquella forma sempre hermosa, sempre ben literària, que tots li coneixem. Respecte a la música, és fàcil endevinar que el mestre Morera l’ha escrit bastant de pressa. No obstant, hi ha en el Garí moltes pàgines que fan el seu efecte (quadros segon i tercer, per exemple).

Com de costum, en Graner presentà algunes decoracions noves. Totes són notables i de gran efecte, però la que resulta verament esplèndida és la del quadro tercer (la Cacera), pintada per en Vilomara. De totes les obres que en Graner ens ha ofert aquesta temporada, i al costat d’Els tres tambors, de La presó de Lleida i d’alguna altra, no hi ha pas dubte que el Fra Garí és una de les que han agradat més.

L’execució, no gaire cuidada”.

Revista musical catalana 028 (abril 1906), p. 84.

“En cinc quadros ha dividit la llegenda el poeta que l’ha versificada. Els senyors Moragas i Alarma han pintat per al primer quadro una hermosa decoració de les anfractuositats del Montserrat, on apareix la cova de Fra Garí. Aquesta decoració, amb lleugeres modificacions de detall, apareix en el segon i darrer quadros. El senyor Junyent s’ha encarregat del tercer quadro que presenta l’espessetat del bosc on el comte fa la caçera. Si la primera decoració és imposant, la segona és senzillament hermosa, augmentat el seu encant el refilar del rossinyols que alegren el paisatge, fent agafar a l’espectador ganes de buscar-los per entre els arbres. La del quart quadro, la sala del festí del comte, la feu el senyor Vilomara, presentant una escena de romàntic senyoriu, fastuosa de debò.

El mestre Morera ha seguit pas a pas amb ses melodies l'idea de la llegenda que tan bé ha sabut versificar i combinar en Xavier Viura i tan artísticament han sabut presentar els senyors Graner i Gual. És una música escaienta, atractiva i fàcil, que suggereix amb força intensitat emotiva diferents aspectes de la popular llegenda.

El teatre estava ple a vessar i el públic aplaudí a tots els elements que contribuïren a l'èxit de l'obra, fent sortir diferents vegades a l'escena als autors de la música i de la lletra".

"[...] aunque se aparte su argumento del de la leyenda, no deja de ser por esto una obra espléndida del inspirado poeta Xavier Viura. La música es sencilla e impregnada de un carácter popular y en ella no deja de verse la mano del célebre Mtro. Morera.

Dos decoraciones nuevas se exhiben en esta visión, una de ellas representa la cueva de Fra Garí; es obra de los conocidos pintores Moragas y Alarma; en conjunto esta decoración es de gran efecto y en particular el fondo de la misma en la que destaca la silueta de las enhiestas montañas de Montserrat. La lástima es que en el primer término faltan algunos detalles de perspectiva a que no parecen más sino un descuido del autor. Vilomara, en el tercer cuadro, podemos decir que se lleva la palma, nos presenta una espesísima selva de efecto sorprendente, siendo una de las mejores obres de tan renombrado artista. El movimiento escénico en este cuadro va dirigido con una seguridad y maestría digna del Sr. Gual.

JOSEPH MORATÓ

ANY II. — CIUTAT DE BARCELONA — N.° 9
8 DE MARÇ DE 1908

Il·lustració 96: MORATÓ, Josep: La sardana dels promesos*. Barcelona: [Imp. Pujol], 1908 (portada).*

Text: CDMAE: Ms. 224; BC: Rull C 50/2-8º;
SGAE: TCA/M.

Música: BC: M 5345/27 [només la sardana final].

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

Primer episodi: "Som entre muntanyes, en un pla que fa el terra darrera la casa on viu la Biela amb el seu pare. A la casa hi ha una finestra. Pel cel apunten les primeres clarors de la matinada. A les llunyanies se sent remor de cantúries. Es pel Febrer, el dia de l'aplec de Sant Blai i els camins de la encontrada bullen de gent que puja a l'ermita. Es veuen passar musics amb els instruments enfundats i es veuen passar pagesos i pageses que es perden en les muntanyes, però tots per un mateix indret... I el dia es va acostant, i també s'acosten les cantúries. [...]" "El cel, que ha anat aclarint-se de xic en xic, arriba ara al enlluernament de la sortida del sol, i els ocells canten i el matí regna."

"I en Francesc, al restar sol, sospira, agafa un roc i va per a tirar-lo a la finestra, però el sobta un crit del Guarda-bosc." "Obre la finestra i es veu que es va acabant de pentinar i segueix el cant: [...]" "I tota enriolada, tanca la finestra."

"La Ció, [...] fa la cuitamaga a l'angle de la casa, aprofitant les distraccions d'en Francesc per a fer-li pessigolles a l'orella amb una palla i amagar-se tot seguit." "Se sent dintre la casa soroll de picarols i remor com de un carruatge que surt"

"I fuig muntanyes amunt, deixant-lo plantat. Ell la segueix un moment amb la vista [...]" "I li corra al darrera apedregant-lo i es perden tots dos entre les muntanyes [...]"

Segon episodi: "Els fadrins i les fadrines han arribat a les envistes del santuari, que s'aixeca al lluny i sobre un espadat. I veus aquí per què tots plegats canten amb joia" "I volen les barretines en l'aire i s'arma fort aldarull [...]

Tercer episodi: “Un planell al cim d’una muntanya. Al fons l’ermita. Colles de gent, formant rodona, acaben de dinar. Per aquí per allà es veuen un tret de rodella, baboyes i una parada de ciris. Cap al fons una carreta apuntalada per a servir de Cadafalch als músics. [...] acaben de dinar els musics, formant rodona i tenint els instruments per terra. Un parell de baylets, d’amagat dels musics, van omplint de pedres el fiscorn. I una colla de joves, començant-se a aixecar, emprèn una cançó amb aire de sardana.”

“El músic del fiscorn s’ha aixecat i va per collir l’instrument. En provar d’aixecar-lo, el troba ple de pedres i adonant-se d’en Martí, [...] es pensa que es l’autor de la feta [...] i li aboca totes les pedres al damunt clavant-li després una llisada de cops de fiscorn.” “[...] El músic, tot mirant-lo de reüll, se’n va cap a la carreta amb els altres, que hi comencen a pujar.” “I comencen a repartir-se garrotades, sent molts els que se serveixen dels pals que han trencat de la carreta dels musics. [...]” “Mentrestant en Martí s’ha tret una pistola [...] per darrera li detura el braç i li pren l’arma, al mateix temps que en Ramón el tomba d’un cop de bastó.” “La baralla s’acaba [...]” “Els joves i noies se disposen a ballar. [...]”

Ressenyes de premsa:

“La sardana dels promesos. Sarsuela en un acte [...]

És una obreta bella, arrodonida, cuidada, a estones fàcil i voluble, d’una voluble finor; a estones sentida, emocionant i sempre agradable, sempre simpàtica i atractiva, tant en les escenes casi caricaturesques [...] com en les d’aire sentimental [...]. I és que, malgrat les dimensions reduïdes de l’obra, La sardana dels promesos és tota una obra, tant per l’acció com pel modo de ser portada; hi ha acció i l’acció és complerta i arrodonida.

[...] Amb obres com l’estrenada ahir d’en Morató es fa Teatre Català, almenys per lo que toca a n’aquest ordre de teatre fàcil, tan necessari per a l’integrament de la vida del nostre Teatre.

Els actors ocuparen bé cadascun el seu lloc. En Giménez, en el paper de Francesc, feu un galan camperol, sincer; en Puiggarí, en el de guardatermes, no pot estar millor; en Santpere, en l’aixalabrut Ramon, donant força color a l’acció; en Morató, Ramon, en el de Martí, fent un hereu que sap lo que val, estigué molt bé; i per aquest estil tots els demés. De les actrius, la senyoreta Baró, en el paper de pastoreta, estigué a grau altura, el va brodar el paper, i ah, no menys amor va treballar el seu la senyoreta Ferrer fent la Biela.

Creiem que La sardana dels promesos la veurem molt temps als cartells del Principal.

La Veu de Catalunya 2531 (05/05/1906), p. 2.

“La sardana dels promesos se titula un quadret de costums populars de caràcter alegre i entretingut que molt oportunament ha vingut a refer als concurrents a les funcions del Principal del encongiment de cor que els hi havia deixat La presó de Lleida, Fra Garí i demés tristeses i esgarrifaments que solen constituir els temes dels autors visionaris que proveeixen l'escenari del degà dels nostres teatres.

En Josep Morató [...] ha construït un quadre ple de vida i de color que interessa i s'escolta amb delectació, doncs se sosté en un semitò de comèdia que manté constantment el somriure als llavis de l'espectador sense haver tingut precisió l'autor de recórrer [...] a grolleries que solen constituir el pes mort que porten les produccions d'aquest gènere.

Un que hi era"

"Entra en el rengló de les visions i, com la majoria d'elles, és com a concepció escènica magreta i estantissa. La lletra, que és d'en J. Morató, no passa de regular. La música del mestre Esquerrà és eixerida i brillant."

La Esquella de la Torratxa 1427 (11/05/1906), p. 316.

"No sabem si La sardana dels promesos és una visió musical o una sarsuela de género chico; però lo que se sap de cert és que la nova producció del crític de La Veu, de Cu-cut i de la Ilustració Catalana és un treball fluixet, molt fluixet, quasi dolent, amb uns xistos a l'anglesa, i en conjunt respirant un aire d'ignorància. La música corrent, discreta, i a trossos, en el caient popular, bastant inspirada. El mestre Esquerrà pot felicitar-se.

"[...] con este título se ha estrenado en el mismo teatro un precioso cuadro lírico del carácter bien marcado de nuestra tierra. El Sr. Morató, con la predilección acostumbrada, ha traducido a la escena, con mucho arte, el lenguaje y las costumbres de la comarca ampurdanesa. No menos acertado ha estado en la música el Mtro. "Al Principal es feia no fa molt una obra titulada La sardana dels promesos, bastant dolenta i basada en la llegenda, com totes les coses dels catalanistes. A tothom va sorprendre que de seguida es deixà de donar l'obra. A què es deu, preguntaven, la suspensió? I era una cosa molt senzilla. Era que el títol es prestava a certs jocs de paraules per part de les noies que hi assistíeu si deien "La sardina dels promesos"."

Cegueta, La

Quadro líric-dramàtic en 1 acte.
Estrena el 04/05/1906.

Il·lustració 97: DE FERRAN, Pere Enric: La cegueta (primera pàgina de la partitura manuscrita).

Lletra de Modest Urgell[28].

Música de Pere Enric de Ferran.

[Escenògrafs no identificats]

Text no localitzat.

Música: SGAE: BAR/B–55.

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

[Els personatges que apareixen mencionats a la partitura són la cegueta, el Baró, en Lluís, la Viola].

[La partitura compta amb una obertura instrumental, la cançó de la cegueta lamentant la seva sort que s'escolta des de dins, una breu represa i la repetició de la cançó a la vista del públic].

Ressenyes de premsa:

"En la vetllada d'ahir va estrenar-se, en primer lloc, aquest quadret del mestre Urgell, que és ben malaguanyat per a primera hora.

És una cosa fina, delicada, en què tot és sentiment, però totes aquestes qualitats las té sense la pal·lidesa que fa grises les coses, sinó amb la suavitat de tantes delicadeses, ja que en el quadret de l'Urgell n'hi ha tota una paleta de colors.

En Lluiset està malalt i en la febre que l'ha de treure dels braços de sa mare, la bona Dolors, demana a la cegueta, la seva amiga, que cada dia va a baix al carrer on sembla que no hi canti més que per a ell.

Demana a la cegueta i aquesta tarda en venir; tarda tant, que quan la veu de les seves dolces cançons arriba a la cambra, en Lluiset ja és al cel.

[28] Inspirat en una obra de J. Ventura.

Quan la Maria, veïna de la Dolors, la fa sabedora de la nova, la cegueta ha fugit corrents i al cap d'una estona torna amb flors per al petitet. L'escena és bonica de debò. La cegueta vol estar a prop d'en Lluiset i li canta la darrera cançó, que sentirà des del cel.

La música amb què ha il·lustrat el quadret el mestre Ferran és una música sentida d'escaienta melodia d'aires populars. La cançó de la cegueta és una troballa d'artista que sent.

Al final, la cortina hagué d'escórrer-se moltes vegades i el públic cridà en totes, amb insistència als autors, que no es trobaven a la casa."

La Veu de Catalunya 2531 (05/05/1906), ed. matí, p. 2.

"També varen portar-se magníficament les que varen interpretar el quadret dramàtic-líric llagrimós La cegueta de l'Urgell, representat en vetllada selecta.

Saben aquells cementiris que fa l'Urgell? Doncs La cegueta encara és una cosa més melancòlica. Això vol dir que commou de debò, perquè arriba al cor. Hi ha una gran intensitat de sentiment en La cegueta.

I el mestre Ferran, en la il·lustració musical que hi ha fet, s'ha portat de primera, com varen portar-se en la interpretació la Baró i la Bozzo i la Viola, que va explicar-se molt bé cantant la romança que constitueix el clau de l'obra."

Cu-cut! 207 (10/05/1906), pp. 39–40.

"És un quadret dramàtic, compost per en Modest Urgell, que s'inspira en un pensament d'en J. Ventura. Té la qualitat dels seus quadros: l'impressionisme. La intensitat de sentiment no hi manca, i el llenguatge és cuidat i literari. Acompanyen al quadret unes melopees d'en Pere Enric de Ferran que s'escolten amb gust i s'adapten molt bé a l'acció del drama."

La Esquella de la Torratxa 1427 (11/05/1906), p. 316.

"Espectacles i Audicions Graner.— Durante la actual serie de Vetllades selectes se estrenó un cuadro dramático musical, obra de los Sres. Urgell y Ferran, titulada La cegueta. En este cuadro sentimental, lleno de poesía y amor, una mujer llora la muerte de su nieto sin hallar consuelo; entonces la ciega, la compañera del niño muerto, le lleva como último presente las flores que deja en el lecho del niño, cantándole la canción de despedida. El cuadro acaba así; acaba dejando en el auditorio una impresión de sentimiento tierno al que coadyuva la inspirada y sencilla música que se une a la acción de la obra."

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

Quadre I: Les crides

"El pati d'un castell gòtic. Abans d'obrir-se la cortina se sent un toc llunyà de trompetes. Al moment d'obrir-se la cortina se repeteix el toc més a prop i es veuen part enfora de la portada els trompeters tocant acompanyats de patges i d'homes d'armes." "De dalt dels merlets contesten els trompeters [...] Entra dins del pati [...] Surt per la porta de mà dreta [...]"

Quadre II: L'amor adiví

"L'escena és el jardí del palau reial. Tarongers i llimoners carregats de fruit voregen tota la banda dreta de l'escenari i formant un bosquet tanquen tot el fons. Entre ells surten agulles capritxoses de vàries glorietes enramades de flors. Una gentada de dames i cavallers i gent de poble, formant un conjunt virolat, amb branques de llorer a la mà, alcen els braços aclamant i victorejant." "Apareix pel caminal de mà esquerra [...] Surten de la porta de mà dreta [...] El fill del rei entra al palau. S'ha fet fosc. Els patges han encès les lluminàries, prenent els jardins un aspecte fantàstic. [...] veu les cambreres qui l'atalaien des del mirador. [...] desapareix pel viarany de mà esquerra."

Quadre III: Prova fallida

"Sala de palau gòtic. Al fons dues grans finestres ogivals amb vitralls de colors. Al obrir-se la cortina, per darrera els vidres es veurà el reflex de les lluminàries de la festa que al cap de pocs moments s'apagaran. La sala restarà il·luminada per grans canelobres. Els ecos llunyans i perduts dels darrers compassos de la dansa sonaran una estona, morint al mateix temps que la llum darrera els vidres. La filla del rei està asseguda en una cadira amb la cara amagada en una mà [...]"

"Quan el fill del rei va a traspassar la porta es topa amb la Isabel que entrava." "Mentre Isabel ha anat dient, l'alba ha anat llustrejant per darrera els finestrals fent brillar els vidres de colors. Se sent tocar a diana per tot el palau."

Quadre IV: La tornada

"La mateixa escena del quadro primer. El toc de marxa amb què acaba el quadro anterior sona de lluny un altre cop, acostant-se gradualment. A l'obrir-se la cortina, el pati està desert. Al cap d'un instant per la portalada entren corrent uns quants homes d'armes. [...]"

Ressenyes de premsa:

"[...] El poema escènic és hermòs i guarda tot l'encís d'una rondalla, però realçat per la presentació plàstica —esplèndidament plàstica— d'un espectacle teatral. (Ja sabem com les conjumina en Graner aquestes coses.)

Per altra banda, en Montoliu, al convertir en quadres els episodis, ha demostrat un extraordinari acert, gràcies al qual l'interès se manté sempre vibrant i va en augment a mida que els fets se descabdellen als ulls de l'espectador.

Encara que sembli estrany, pot dir-se que la faula de Donzella qui va a la guerra resulta un drama alegre, amb l'alegria dels tons clars i dels sentiments nobles i purs manifestats ingènuament. Per això se n'agraden l'esperit i els ulls alhora.

Val a dir que en Lambert i en Sancho Marraco, dos joves mestres, han completat l'obra d'en Montoliu acompanyant-la d'una música atractiva i inspirada i joguinosa: —música jova, com els seus autors.

Jo no sé quins trossos són de l'un ni quins són del altre. Ni vull saber-ho. Ne tinc prou amb trobar-los tots ben atractius i inspirats i originals.

Cal dir que la Baró encarna el paper de protagonista amb aquell talent que té per a adaptar-se a tota mena de papers, fins els més oposats al seu temperament! Ella ve a ser l'ànima de l'obra, i en lots els passatges hi està a l'altura de la situació. En Giménez fa el fill del rei, i és veritablement el galan que cal a una semblant dama: galàn de nom i de fets. La Bozzo i la Ferrer estan també a to en els seus papers respectius de reina i princesa. En Puiggarí. majestuós i segur en el de rei; en Marxuach ple de caràcter en el de comte vell. Tots els demés, a l'altura dels papers.

La presentació, esplèndida.

En resum: una visió atractiva pera tota mena d'espectadors.

Per això cal esperar que s'aguantarà llarg temps als cartells del Principal.

"La visió dramàtica del nostre amic Manuel de Montoliu Donzella qui va a la guerra, la que tan bellament han il·lustrat amb música els mestres Lambert i Sancho Marraco, és una delicadesa. En Montoliu ens ha donat una nova i bella prova del seu talent poètic.

Al Principal representen la visió tots els dies i cada vegada millor; esperem que el nostre públic hi acudirà per a fruir d'una obra tan catalana i que tan bé sap fer-nos veure lo que les nostres rondalles ens conten de temps llunyans i venturosos."

El Poble català 93 (17/05/1906), p. 1.

“I ara entrem al Principal... Ja et dic jo que són ben bromistes també a can Graner. Fan una cosa titulada Donzella qui va a la guerra, que us dic que n’hi ha per llogar-hi cadires. Figureu’s que surt en Marxuach vestit de conde vell i diu que ha d’anar a la guerra perquè el rei ho vol i que no hi ha d’anar perquè és vell. I lo pitjor del cas és que no pot enviar-hi el noi, perquè tot lo que té són noies. I diu malhaja i altres paraules que venen a ser renecs d’aquell temps, i tot perquè no té fill baró. Però l’Emília Baró s’està a un costat de l’escenari i per la cara que fa ja se li veu que en trama alguna.

Tot d’un plegat, resulta que la xicota ja se l’ha tramada. I ella que va i diu al comte: «Si no teniu fill baró, teniu una filla tan Baró com el més pintat. I aquesta filla anirà a la guerra.» I venen uns patges i, zis-zas!, li tallen les trenes que, amb tot i ser en un temps en què encara no s’usava el vigor del cabello del doctor Ayer, no deixen d’arribar-hi fins al fosso. Després d’això, me la vesteixen de militar d’aquell temps i ja no hi ha Guerreros que hi valguin, per Mendozas que es diguin.

I ve el segon quadro i ja han passat set anys, durant els quals la xicota ha fet més estragos que un dels del hule si el deixen fer. Però dels més forts que fa, ne son víctimes en Giménez, que és el fill del rei y la Ferrer, que és la filla de la reina. I en Giménez tot és dir que la Baró no és baró i que s’hi vol casar; i la Ferrer li contesta que sí que és baró i que s’hi vol casar ella. I la Baró vinga fer més estragos. I en Giménez, da-li que no és baró, i la Ferrer torna-hi que és baró. I s’acaba el segon quadro que encara no s’ha aclarit si ho és o no ho és.

Però ve el tercer i figura que en Giménez s’adorm a conseqüència d’un obligat de guitarra que li toca la Baró. I quan és adormit, la Baró li tira unes dècimes en les que ve a dir-li que no és baró. Mireu la trapassera! I aleshores entra un empleat de les pompes fúnebres i li portal títol de propietat d’un nínxol, perquè a la cuenta en Marxuach s’està morint i és qüestió de tenir-ho tot a punt. I la Baró es despedeix d’en Puiggarí que fa de rei y de la Bozzo que fa de reina i de tot el senyoriu de la cort. Però en Giménez fa un punt dels seus i diu que anirà amb ella, perquè vol acabar d’aclarir si és baró o no és baró...

I ve el quart quadro... Allò de que en Marxuach se moria era una guatlla. Atropellat ja ho està, però no tant com feia veure l’empleat de les pompes fúnebres. I res: que aleshores s’aclareix que la Baró es baró i noia a la vegada. I en Giménez diu que s’hi casarà i en Marxuach s’hi confronta i ja està.

Tot això en Montoliu ho ha posat en vers i s’hi ha lluït; i en Lambert i en Sancho Marraco ho han posat en solfes i també s’hi han lluït; i la Baró i la Ferrer i la Bozzo i en Giménez i en Puiggarí i en Marxuach i tota la colla s’hi han fet sopes; i en Graner igual, gastant-hi la plata.”

Cu-cut! 208 (17/05/1906), pp. 54–55.

“Donzella qui va a la guerra és una ampliació del romanç que amb el mateix títol figura al Romancer popular de la terra catalana publicat per don Marià Aguiló. La faula és prou coneguda. [...] Amb la base de la cançó popular, en Manel de Montoliu ha composat quatre quadros medievals d’una frescor ben assaboridora i d’un caràcter extraordinari. El moviment escènic es porta traçudament i l’acció avança interessant i viva, malgrat lo convencional del tema. És una rondalla fantasiosa que es descabdella en un medi ben estudiat i en el que lo pintoresc se fon amb lo dramàtic i lo dramàtic amb lo alegre. En Lambert i en Sancho Marraco, dos compositors dels més joves que tenim, han posat música a l'obra: una música vaporosa i enjogassada que ajuda a fer viure les situacions de conjunt.

"[…] La nueva visión Donzella qui va a la guerra no presenta en el decorada alguna novedad; la música está bien llevada, siendo de notar ciertos pasajes del tercer cuadro por el artificio de la orquestación. La letra, inspirada y natural, es debida al escritor catalán M. de Montoliu, que ha sabido tan bien poner en escena el argumento de la leyenda catalana, aunque no exenta de ciertos anacronismos que en el campo de la poesía ya pueden permitirse.

Fi del monopoli del teatre català al Romea i lloguer del Principal per Graner

"[...] Per als aimants del Teatre Català, crec els plaurà una notícia que corre aquests dies portant una alenada d'esperança. El distingit artista en Lluís Graner té el projecte de fer veritable art en pro del nostre teatre. Ha arrendat per cinc anys el teatre Principal i es proposa donar en ell representacions líriques i dramàtiques de la nostra escena. Si fos un empresari dels que corren, amb franquesa no m'hauria entusiasmat.

Al emprendre's-ho l'artista conegudíssim, és una garantia que ens assegura poguer fruir sensacions artístiques de debò, i molt més encara figurant-hi al seu costat i com a directors l'Adrià Gual i n'Enric Morera. Coneixem a tots tres i sabem lo molt que valen. Amunt els cors!

Seguim-los i ajudem-los tots amb nostre esforç, cooperem amb tot l'entusiasme que sentim per el desenrotllo del teatre de nostra Catalunya, qui sap si aquest és el primer pas envers l'alçament del veritable TEATRE CATALÀ que tant ansiem els bons aimants de Talia...

Comença a desglaçar-se la indiferència... Aixequem l'esperit i sadollem-nos d'Art... Creiem en Ell...

Jordi Català"

Talia 27 (19/08/1905), pp. 246–247.

"Si hem de judicar per lo que es diu, potser millorarà una mica durant l'hivern que s'acosta el moviment teatral català. Està clar que fins que es vagi a la creació d'un organisme nacional amb conservatori propi, actors propis i edifici propi, el teatre de la terra no anirà per bon camí. No ha de ser el teatre una obra d'empresa particular, sinó una obra de tots i per a tots, una institució com els Estudis Universitaris, com l'Orfeó, com els museus...

Amb tot, mentre no es faci res en aquest sentit, és bo que el moviment se descentralitzi, que desaparegui tot monopoli i tot abassegament, que els autors no hagin de veure's obligats a acudir a un sol teatre i a suportar les vexacions d'una empresa orgullosa de la seva sobirania tirànica. Descentralitzant-se el moviment, tal vegada els nous organismes que es creïn donaran a conèixer elements que quan vingui la gran hora de la creació del teatre, puguin ser d'utilitat. Doncs, cal alegrar-se'n de les noves que corren respecte a la vinent temporada.

Per ara sembla que hi haurà teatre català a l'Apolo. Està clar que, tant pel barri en que està enclavada aquella sala d'espectacles com per les dificultats creades per l'organització de la companyia amb elements dispersos, no cal esperar que la campanya que es dugui a terme influeixi en gran manera a modificar la situació de la nostra escena. Però, segons es diu, en algunes de les representacions hi tindrà intervenció l'Adrià Gual, i això ja es ben satisfactori.

Al Principal també s'hi farà teatre de casa. En Graner, no tenint-ne prou amb la sala Mercè, l'ha llogat per cinc anys, a fi d'organitzar-hi diferents espectacles plàstics, musicals i d'altres menes, però tols marcats per un segell ben català. I entre aqueixos espectacles, dividits en sessions de poca durada, destinarà cada setmana algunes vetlles senceres a teatre líric i a teatre parlat, encarregant la direcció del primer a en Morera[30] i la del segon al mateix Gual i tenint el propòsit de presentar les obres de la manera més perfecta possible, a fi de fer-ne més atractiva la representació.

Els dies de teatre seran de primer entovi el dilluns i el divendres, els quals es consideraran com a dies de moda. Però si l'èxit corona els bons propòsits d'en Graner, es molt possible que les vetlles teatrals vagin envaint la setmana i fent enllà els demés espectacles que s'organitzin. I qui sap si de mica en mica podrà anar-se encaminant el teatre català?

Mentrestant, ja ho hem dit, ens alegrem que es tregui el monopoli exercit d'alguns anys ençà per una sola empresa, en detriment dels autors, del públic y del art. Mentre s'espera l'organització nacional, vinguin, si res més no, empresaris artistes!

La Ilustració catalana 116 (20/08/1905), p. 541.

"Fa algun temps que es nota un moviment simpàtic tant per part del públic com de la premsa en pro del nostre teatre. Ja era hora! Els que havem seguit pas a pas totes les penes i alegries del teatre català, els que amb greu mal humor havem vist anunciades al teatre Romea obres d'allende el Ebro i, per cert, no de les bones, barrejades amb les de casa; els que havem anat en funcions en benefici i vist amb vergonya aquella safata voltada de llums com si es demanés almoina, i altres misèries que val més callar-les, ens n'havem de felicitar i havem de dir com en Jordi Català en una de ses cròniques, la del nombre passat: Amunt els cors!

El Teatre Català, amb lo temps que ha estat instal·lat al Romea, ha fet tota l'evolució que se li podia demanar, si es té en compte els estrets límits en què s'havia de moure, i avui aquella empresa amb son modo de veure, veu que l'obra que fins ara ha explotat se n'hi va de les mans, que surten artistes com en Graner i altres, que per amor a l'art i a la terra exposen llurs interessos per aixecar nostre teatre amb dignitat i amb una honradesa artística intatxable.

I convé per bé de la nostra escena que tots hi ajudem a la mida de les nostres forces: els autors presentant-hi llurs obres, els artistes deixant de banda rancúnies de bastidors i treballant amb entusiasme, i el públic acudint a les representacions. Si tots no hi ajudem, si desenganyat de sa empresa en Graner hagués de suprimir les obres catalanes, allavors no tindríem dret a queixar-nos, i hauríem de suportar tots, tant autors com actors i públic, les petiteses i mesquindats que per dissort fins ara havem suportat.

Lo que ha passat al Teatre Català en aquests últims temps és ben estrany. La companyia que baix la direcció d'en Borràs hi actuava interpretava les obres amb entusiasme i el públic hi assistia. [...] I ja es parlava d'una excursió a l'Amèrica quan, enllepolits per l'èxit, vingueren de Madrid i ens prengueren a en Borràs, i lo que ha passat aquesta temporada, tots ho havem vist. Artistes aplaudits que, per demanar una misèria més de sou, els treuen de la companyia i en venen de castellanes i se'ls emporten; un autor de reconegut talent, l'Iglésias, abandona el Romea per anar a estrenar ses obres a un altre teatre; fan un dilluns de moda Baró, assistint-hi tota la cursileria castellana i catalana per a riure's de nostra hermosa parla [...]

No ens convé acabar-ho tot això? Doncs en Graner ens dona una ocasió en què li podem demostrar nostre amor al teatre de la terra, i amb seguretat que si ell veu que ens ho prenem amb entusiasme, assistint al seu teatre, traurà el cinematògraf i demés varietés que hi vol posar i en comptes de donar-nos dugues representacions setmanals d'obres catalanes, en donarà a diari, i ja tindrem començat lo verdader edifici que ha d'ésser lo Teatre Català.

P. Gabardós Gatell"

Talia 29 (02/09/1905), pp. 263–264.

"[...] Perduda per al teatre català la campanya de l'Apolo, ens cal girar els ulls al Principal per a cobrar certa confiança. Per a les representacions que s'hi donaran ja hi ha literats que treballen en obres originals, en la traducció d'algunes de les més hermoses del teatre modern i d'altres èpoques. I és molt possible que en Graner, si el públic respon, no pugui limitar-se al parell de sessions setmanals que ara es proposa dedicar al teatre parlat i cantat, sinó que hagi de donar-les-hi major amplitud, convertint-les en base de la campanya d'hivern, lo qual fora de desitjar, encara que no fos més que per a estimular a les demés empreses a un treball seriós i artístic, en benefici d'autors i públic. En aquet concepte —en l'artístic— és d'esperar que la temptativa del Principal donarà bons fruits, puix no cal dubtar de la serietat artística del gran artista que és en Graner, ni de la d'en Gual, que serà qui dirigirà les representacions parlades. "Anteayer terminó sus compromisos la empresa del Teatro Principal y desde ayer tomó posesión de dicho coliseo el nuevo arrendatario, el celebrado artista D. Luis Graner, quien ha ordenado que se realicen notables mejoras, habiendo empezado ya el decorado de la fachada.

La temporada se inaugurará el día 12 del actual, habiendo quedado abierto el abono en la sala Mercè. Los espectáculos que se anuncian serán dignos de Barcelona por su índole y por la manera de presentarlos y consistirán en grandes cuadros plásticos musicales, en funciones del teatro catalán, alternadas con proyecciones cinematográficas y películas habladas. El espectáculo se subdividirá en secciones."

Il·lustració 100: Retall de la portada de la revista Talia 36 (21/10/1905), dedicada a Lluís Graner.

"Abans, quan se parlava d'en Graner, tot lo que es deia referia a sos quadros; era bonic parlar d'una Exposició Graner a can Parés, per exemple, a quina exhibició s'hi abocava la Barcelona artística, des del mestre en pintura a l'amateur més modest. I tothom admirava aquelles pinzellades fermes, reblertes de llum natural i artificial que en Graner sap expressar tan bé en ses teles; en el "forn de vidre", en la "pesca a l'encesa", en els grupos de bevedors, en tot on s'hi escau la llum que sembla arrencada del natural.

Allò era l'obra d'en Graner pintor; avui la seva obra s'ha estès, ha anat més enllà; en Graner, sense perdre son caràcter d'artista eminent, n'ha fet una altra d'obra, una obra que pot ser el començ del veritable Teatre Català, baix els dos aspectes, líric i dramàtic. Enamorat de tot lo bell i que tendeixi a donar fruits ben assaonats en tot lo que a l'Art puga referir-se, va sortir-nos en Graner amb la sala Mercè, tal vegada per a polsar la opinió sana en el sentit del gust artístic, i potser covant ja en son cervell la idea que ha portat a feliç terme en el teatre Principal.

L'obra d'en Graner, doncs, és lloable per varis conceptes; en primer lloc, perquè quedant-se ell amb el degà dels teatres barcelonins ha impedit que aquells venerables murs anessen a parar a mans d'una empresa mercantil, com s'havia dit fa temps, per a construir-hi un banc, o que dintre d'ells hi continués el sacrilegi de representar-hi porqueries del genero menut o cinematògrafs immorals.

I, sobre tot, un dels motius principals que ens indueix a alabar l'obra de l'eminent pintor és el de que gràcies a sa iniciativa, Barcelona pot fruir d'espectacles cultes, en els que l'escenografia catalana pot fer ostentació de la riquesa de talent dels pintors Vilomara, Junyent (O.), Moragas i Alarma, Urgellès, Brunet i Pous i altres que de seguir hi prendran part. Quina llàstima, en ocasió semblant, que el mestre de tots, l'inolvidable Soler i Rovirosa no puga col·laborar-hi en aquesta obra! I ademés d'aital manifestació escenogràfica, la idea d'escenificació de temes populars catalans portada en quadros plàstics, en els que ademés del talent dels nostres poetes, s'hi junyeix la inspiració de nostres músics, donen a l'obra d'en Graner més valor; i per si això no bastés a fer-la gran, ens resta la secció de Teatre Català, que ens farà conèixer les tragèdies gregues, les filigranes shakespearianes, obres de poetes francesos, de dramaturgs italians i alemanys i vàries de nostres autors.

Ho veieu si en té d'importància l'obra d'en Graner? Ell la somnià, iniciant-la en l'artístic local de la sala Mercè, i avui l'ha consolidada i l'ha estesa dintre els murs del teatre Principal, secundat amb entusiasme per altres elements valiosos. [...]

Reformes realitzades al Principal per Graner

"El teatre Principal.— Per últim, amb les representacions d'ans d'ahir diumenge varen acabar les funcionetes de varietats organitzades per l'empresa que l'ha tingut fins ara al seu càrrec , amb dolor dels que desitgen que l'antic teatre de la Santa Creu recobri el prestigi que en altre temps havia tingut. Des de ara, doncs, corre el Principal a càrrec d'en Lluís Graner, que el té arrendat per cinc anys, durant els quals té el propòsit de realitzar-hi una campanya seriosa, altament artística i catalana, posant a contribució tants elements valuosos com puguin contribuir a la brillantor del conjunt.

Per a tornar a aquell teatre tot l'esplendor que li han fet perdre les empreses que s'hi han succeït d'alguns anys d'aquesta banda, començarà en Graner per realitzar-hi importants reformes materials, en las que ahir mateix va començar a treballar una nombrosa brigada d'obrers. La il·luminació de la sala sofrirà avantatjoses transformacions i la façana serà objecte d'importants obres que la milloraran bon xic, traient-li aquell aspecte de cosa revellida i morta que avui dia té. Amb tal objecte, i agafant com a motiu principal el dibuix que figura a la capçalera dels cartells que es plantaran per les cantonades i a la del prospecte que repartirem avui als nostres lectors encaixat amb el número, es decorarà convenientment tot l'exterior de l'edifici i es completarà la decoració amb una profusió de llum que la farà doblement atractiva durant la nit. [...] La inauguració dels Espectacles Graner serà el dia 12 del mes que som, començant las funcions d'abono amb la que es celebrarà el dia 16."

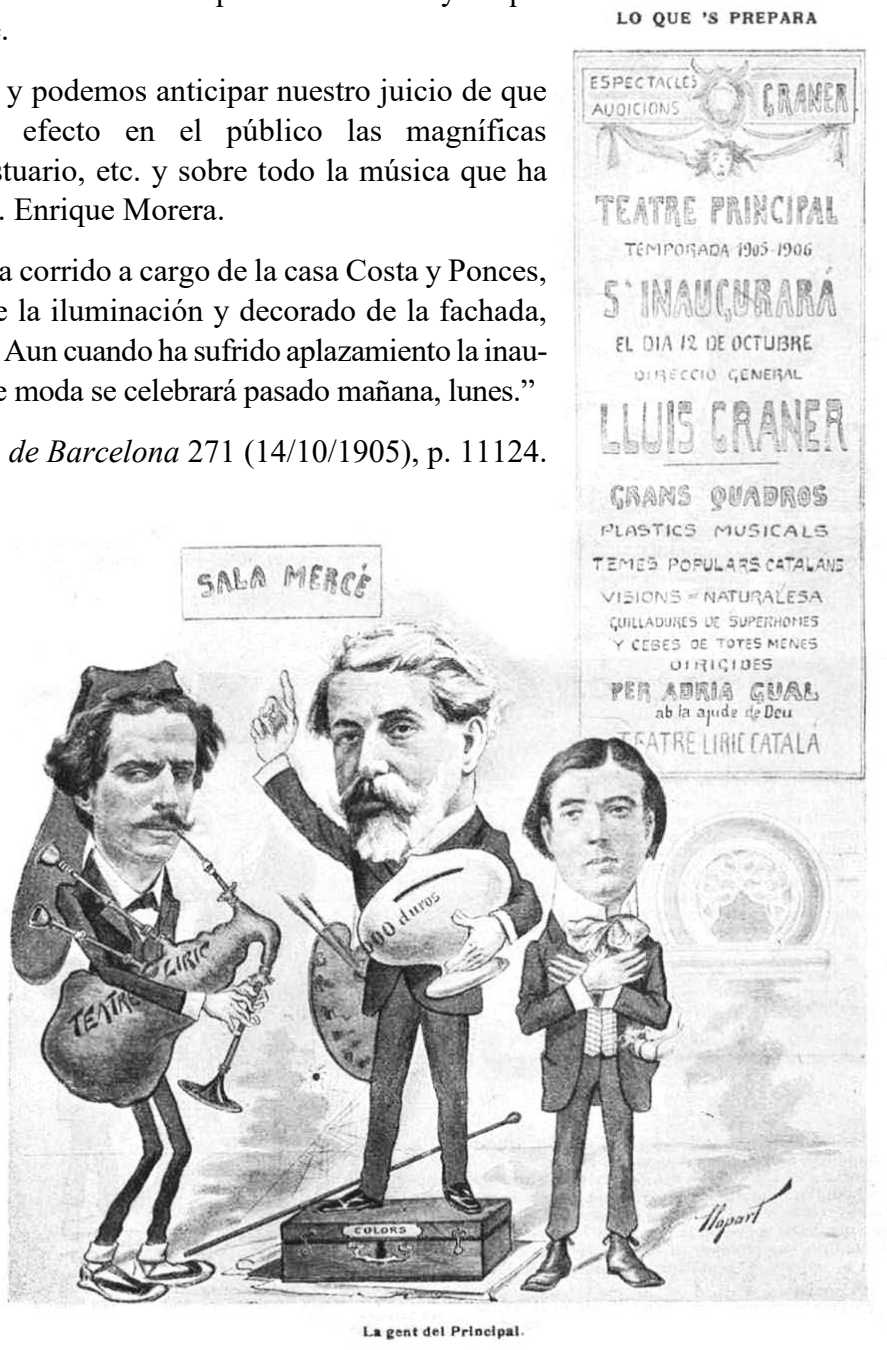
"Pasado mañana abre sus puertas el teatro Principal, con el espectáculo que ya se ha anunciado. El empresario, D. Luis Graner, queriendo convertir el decano de nuestros teatros en punto de reunión de la buena sociedad, ha introducido en el mismo grandes mejoras que el público agradecerá ciertamente.

La fachada ha sido restaurada y en los huecos de los balcones se han colocado artísticas vidrieras de colores, muy vistosas; el vestíbulo ha sufrido una completa restauración; en los palcos se han cambiado los pasamanos. El escenario ha sido objeto de mejoras importantes, que permitirán presentar los espectáculos con toda propiedad y al efecto se ha montado una instalación eléctrica que lo dotará de espléndida luz, pudiendo producirse diversidad de tonos por medio de combinación de bombillas de colores. El abono a las funciones de moda es numeroso, lo que hace presumir que aquellas se verán muy concurridas."



Diario de Barcelona 267 (10/10/1905), p. 10942.

"Decididamente esta noche se inaugurarán en el teatro Principal las audiciones musicales, innovación debida al notable artista D. Luis Graner, que se propone dotar a Barcelona de espectáculos cultos y en que descuelle el más refinado arte.

Hemos asistido a los ensayos y podemos anticipar nuestro juicio de que han de producir excelente efecto en el público las magníficas decoraciones, el attrezzo, vestuario, etc. y sobre todo la música que ha escrito el reputado maestro D. Enrique Morera.

La instalación eléctrica, que ha corrido a cargo de la casa Costa y Ponces, merece elogios, lo propio que la iluminación y decorado de la fachada, que produce caprichoso efecto. Aun cuando ha sufrido aplazamiento la inauguración, la primera función de moda se celebrará pasado mañana, lunes."

Inici de l'activitat de la nova empresa al Principal

"LA FUTURA CAMPANYA DEL PRINCIPAL

El dia 12 començarà al mític teatre de la Santa Creu la campanya que en favor de la nostra escena vol dur a cap en Lluís Graner.

Els espectacles que pensa donar-hi l'eminent artista són de diferents menes, però tenint tots el major caràcter de cultura possible. Per això, tant en el ram líric com en el literari, ha procurat rodejar-se d'elements prestigiosos que l'han d'ajudar en la empresa, a la que contribuiran també per lo que toca a la escenografia tots els bons escenògrafs de casa.

Per ara anuncia dos dies de moda setmanals, dedicats tots dos al teatre català:—l'un al líric i l'altre al dramàtic i còmic, ajudant-se per a la direcció tècnica del primer dels mestres Pujol i Lambert, i servint-se per a la direcció escènica del segon, de l'Adrià Gual, que tan bona mà ha demostrat en diferents ocasions per a posar les obres amb exquisida propietat.

Baix la direcció d'aqueixos elements i la general del mateix Graner, actuaran els elements interpretadors lírics i dramàtics quals retrats donem en el present nombre: [Serafina Ferrer, Emília Baró, Ramon Tor, Enric Giménez, Lluís Puiggarí, Conrat Giralt, Ramon Bataller, Artur Balot, Amadeu Casas, Carles Capdevila].

Actuaran en la interpretació de les bones tragèdies i comèdies del Teatre Grec, traduïdes al català per bons escriptors de la terra tals com en Josep Carner i en Salvador Vilaregut; actuaran en obres líriques en les que s'hi entrellacen els noms dels mestres de la música Nicolau, Pedrell i Morera amb els dels literats Pin i Soler, Oliver, Mossèn Costa i altres; actuaran en produccions notables de Shakespeare, Molière, Cervantes, Hauptman i altres autors antics i moderns, així com en produccions, drames originals d'autors de casa, entre les que ja s'anuncien L'hostal de la Bolla, adaptació escènica de la novel·la d'en Miquel S. Oliver, La tia Tecleta d'en Pin i La jova d'en Morató.

Un dels gèneres que sembla destinat a cridar l'atenció del públic és el de les visions acompanyades de música i cant i basades en temes llegendaris i populars, com El Comte l'Arnau, La Fustots, etc., etc. Per a dur-les a l'escena, en Graner ha posat a contribució el treball dels més excel·lents escenògrafs —Alarma, Vilomara, Junyent, Urgellès, tots els que valen— a fi de que la inspiració dels nostres músics més eminents i la dels nostres poetes més exquisits pugui ser manifestada sobre el fons artístic que es mereix.

Tot fa suposar que la campanya Graner al Principal, serà digna de qui l'ha organitzada, aprofitant l'esforç de tots. Déu faci que aquest esforç sigui ben aprofitat i que el públic hi respongui; Déu faci que en Graner es vegi obligat a donar al nostre teatre més dels dos dies setmanals que per ara hi destina."

"El teatro Principal está sufriendo una completa restauración bajo la nueva empresa del reputado pintor Luis Graner, propietario de la sala Mercè. Tanto en el interior como en el exterior se realizan importantes mejoras, aumentando espléndidamente la iluminación y enriqueciendo el decorado. La fachada se adornará con un artístico motivo de decoración.

La nueva Empresa Graner se propone escenificar por medio de cuadros plásticos, musicales y corales, temas populares, visiones de naturaleza, de historia, de costumbres, etc., como El comte Arnau, La Fustots, Ramon Llull, La matinada, Els tres tambors, La presó de Lleida, etc., con la reputada cooperación de los literatos catalanes José Carner, Magin Morera, Adrián Gual, Costa y Llobera, Guimerà, Pin y Soler, etc.; los músicos catalanes Pedrell, Morera y otros y los escenógrafos Junyent, Alarma, Moragas y Vilomara.

Estas representaciones alternarán con proyecciones cinematográficas y películas habladas, y, bajo la dirección de Adrián Gual, representaciones catalanas de tragedias griegas y obras del teatro antiguo y moderno como Edipo Rey, de Sófocles; Alkestis, de Eurípides, y otras de Llucià, Shakespeare, Molière, Cervantes, Marivaux, A. de Mussel, Goethe, Hauptmann, Goldoni, y L'hostal de la Bolla, de Miguel S. Oliver; La tía Tecleta y La Poruga, de Pin y Soler; La jova, de Morató, etc. La empresa se propone que en todas estas representaciones resplandezca la propiedad del arte y la magnificencia, para lo cual cuenta con sobrados elementos para realizarlo."

"Catalunya està d'enhorabona amb motiu de la nova, novíssima manifestació de cultura del Teatre Principal de Barcelona, duta amb gran fe i entusiasme a feliç terme per l'expert i famós artista Sr. Graner. És aquesta una iniciativa que esparvera i que ofegaria als més encoratjats, si no fos alenada per una fe pregona i no es tingués la consciència del Sr. Graner, de tots i cada un dels elements a conjuminar, d'altíssima complexitat, per arribar a una fi esplendorosa d'estètica i patriotisme.

El teatre, tingut antigament per escola de bones costums i perversament convertit en els nostres dies en una càtedra del xorguisme, on les idees malsanes i la baixesa de les passions humanament bestials, eres past de tot el poble sense diferències de classe, necessitava qui el redimís i el tornés a aixecar a l'altura moral que li correspon. Aqueix alçaprem formidable i hermosa redempció, començada ja amb gran èxit, és l'obra magna i justament aplaudida del genial Sr. Graner. Ell és qui, amb una elevació de mires, mai prou justament elogiades com es mereix, està obrant el gran consorci de la moral i de l'art, fins avui rebregades per un instint lo més bestial i misèrrim.

El patriotisme, l'estètica i la bondat, cremant com un encens dintre el cor del geni, era hora ja que, amb explosió volcànica, eixissin a sanejar l'ambient del nostre teatre, envaint amb els perfums de la bellesa i hermosura humanes els temples de l'expansió i del solás. Ben satisfets poden estar-ne els iniciadors i el nostre poble d'aquesta nova i titànica empresa d'una cultura i significances les més grans i fondes, que tant debò sigui la definitiva del sanejament del teatre a Catalunya.

Abonament a les vetllades de moda

"Accediendo a la petición de los señores D. Ramon Albó, D. Juan Alandi, don Ignacio de Gispert y D. Francisco Maspons, comisionados por numerosos elementos de nuestra más selecta sociedad, la empresa del teatro Principal ha acordado abrir un abono a seis funciones de día de moda, que se celebrarán los viernes, a partir del 3 de noviembre.

Se representarán obras de Sófocles, Shakespeare, Cervantes, Molière y Goldoni, combinadas con estrenos de comedias catalanas de los señores Vilanova, Pin y Soler y Oliver.

Teniendo en cuenta la propiedad y riqueza insuperables con que la empresa dará a conocer un repertorio tan selecto, y la moralidad y buen gusto exquisitos que resplandecen en la dirección de los Espectacles-Audicions Graner, han abierto el abono muy distinguidas familias de esta capital, que darán gran brillantez a las veladas."

Diario de Barcelona 286 (29/10/1905), pp. 11774–11775.

"[...] El senyor Graner, [...] per lo que toca al Principal ha contractat trenta músics de lo millor per a entretenir els intermedis dels seus dies de moda amb Valsos Bostons, minuets a lo Bolzoni, etc., etc., i si algun dia per atzar s'executen alguns fragments de música selecta, el pressupost designat per a la música no permet els assajos necessaris perquè la cosa resulti sèria, com succeí amb els trossos de Schumann intercalats en la rondalla popular La Fustots, i amb la música que nostre Pedrell escrigué per a la visió de naturalesa (segons asseguren els autors), La matinada.

Tot lo dit, doncs, ens demostra palesament que l'exemple donat pels homes de nostra terra que es prengueren seriosament les manifestacions artístic-musicals no ha donat el fruit desitjat, i que en conseqüència és del tot convenient una nova campanya encaminada a tornar el nostre públic cap a lo verdader i sanitós, artísticament parlant, i... aquesta és la missió que per lo que atany a la música de aquí en davant deu complir la Associació Musical de Barcelona [...]."

Opinió sobre la contribució artística de les visions musicals

"Cuestiones artísticas de escenografía

[…] Para colmo de perfección y magnificencia, el propio Graner, que ya en la sala Mercè se esmeraba para ofrecer espectáculos siempre cultos, siempre animados y siempre artísticos, ha implantado en el teatro Principal una ampliación de sus anteriores propósitos y cabe afirmar que ha logrado llevarse de calle al público, que se estruja a sus puertas para poder penetrar en el venerable recinto.

Las visiones musicales Graner, por lo que contribuyen al desarrollo de la escenografía deben ser celebradas, pero mucho más por el sentido altamente civilizador y altamente moral (si es que son dos cosas distintas) que en sí encierran. El insigne artista nos ha demostrado que el público no desdeñaba lo culto por serlo, sino porque no se lo presentaban bien. A en voz, llena de desprendimiento, los músicos, los poetas, los escenógrafos, los comediantes han logrado formar un núcleo homogéneo de perfección, causando en el auditorio emoción profundísima, al par que saludable.

Para alentar a Graner y a los artistas que le secundan escribimos este artículo; al mismo tiempo queremos repetir que El comte l'Arnau debe ser aplaudido por todos cuantos sintamos la patria y el arte. Carner en su sobriedad y Morera en sus notas inspiradas nos han hecho sentir hondo. Aquel delicioso canto de las tres doncellas que bordan seda y estám, alternado con las graves notas del canto popular son de un efecto teatral magnífico.

Y ¿qué diremos de las decoraciones y de los trajes? Olegario Junyent en la primera, rica de color y rebosando verdad, nos ofrece un hermoso paisaje, en el cual no encontramos otro tilde que al aspecto excesivamente vetusto de la ermita, atendida la época en que se supone la acción. Es una página de maestro superada, no obstante, por la que nos ofrece en La matinada.

Moragas y Alarma en el abetal pirenaico del segundo cuadro han tenido que luchar con la monotonía de los tonos nevados, y han vencido, especialmente en el segundo efecto de luces. Su éxito es indubitable.

En cuanto a Urgellès, debe asignársele un elogio indiscutible por haberle tocado en suerte el cuadro de menos variedad y que menos se prestaba a efectos y haber sabido resolverlo con sinceridad, con color de época y parquedad de efectos. Pero mucho más nos gusta su cocina de La Fustots.

Vilomara en el último cuadro, resuelve gallardamente un problema de perspectiva y de construcción con aquella maestría que le es peculiar. Su palacio condal deja en el espectador una impresión duradera. Para el mejor efecto de todas estas decoraciones, convendría alguna mayor perfección en los cambios de luz. A pesar de todo, no regateamos nuestros aplausos al iniciador Graner, ni a los distinguidos escenógrafos, así como a Gual, el director de escena.

Buenaventura Bassegoda"

“Ya recordarán nuestros lectores la serie de artículos que publicamos el año pasado sobre la Iglesia y el Teatro moral y moralizador como poderoso elemento educativo de los pueblos, en vista de la alarmante y progresiva corrupción de costumbres y perversión de ideas que están rápidamente socavando la institución de la familia y desquiciando la sociedad.

Tomando en cuenta en los artículos de referencia las dificultades que había de presentar la fundación de dicho teatro, dada la apatía que en general suele dominar entre los que nos sumamos con los buenos, proponíamos que de no poder desde un principio alcanzar el más, nos contentáramos con el menos, poniéndonos en actividad con la mira puesta en la meta para llegar a ella evolutivamente si no podíamos conseguirlo de buenas a primeras.

Pues bien; Barcelona ha visto surgir inopinada y súbitamente un hombre que reúne las condiciones no ya para acometer por sí solo tan difícil proyecto, sino para realizarlo con tal empuje que desde el primer momento se ha colocado a la cabeza pues, además de haber puesto a contribución casi todas las Bellas Artes en el desarrollo de sus espectáculos, revisten estos verdadera variedad y originalidad.

Celo ardiente, competencia acreditada, actividad asombrosa, largueza incomparable, simpatías generales, todo lo ha reunido el señor Graner, quien de un golpe ha llegado al desiderátum ofreciendo en el elegante decano de nuestros coliseos, en el Teatre de Santa Creu, los espectáculos pequeño y grande; la compañía cómica y la dramática; el teatro lírico y el trágico; presentando las obras con un gusto refinado y exigente.

Los artistas que le prestan su concurso toman su cometido con tanto empeño que se asimilan las obras, y combinándose las inspiraciones de todos producen una deliciosa homogeneidad artística.

Resulta, pues, que la obra del señor Graner es digna del apoyo del público honrado, no solamente por su bondad moral, sino también por la artística, la que por sí sola es bastante para merecer el favor del público en general.

Pero creemos que todo católico debiera apoyarla de una manera muy decidida, y por este lado no hemos de ocultar nuestro temor de que no se le ayude en la medida que se merece; pues, aparte de la apatía de los buenos a que antes hemos aludido; suele suceder que los que no usan de una cosa porque no sienten su falta, creen que todo el mundo puede bonitamente pasarse sin ella, y quizás esto contribuya a que ciertas empresas loables no puedan realizarse por falta de cooperación.

¿Qué importa que el teatro moral no haya de aprovechar a los que viven una vida muy espiritual y a quienes su frecuentación hasta pudiera perjudicarles disipando su espíritu y aferrándoles a las cosas terrenas? ¿Acaso puede exigiese a todos esa espiritualidad?

La fatiga de muchos individuos engolfados en la lucha por la vida material para atender a las necesidades de sus familias reclama descanso en algún honesto esparcimiento para mantener, restaurar y conservar las fuerzas del cuerpo y del espíritu. Los jóvenes lo necesitan también para el mejor desarrollo de su espíritu y hasta de su organismo. Y generalmente cuando no puede satisfacerse esta necesidad con un esparcimiento honesto, se satisface con el que haya, por desmoralizador que resulte, pues somos muy acomodicios y en estos casos pruébase la enorme elasticidad de muchísimas conciencias y el ingenio para atenuar los funestos resultados de esos espectáculos que se apoderaron por completo del Teatro.

Pues bien; el teatro moral es el mejor (hoy el único aceptable) esparcimiento público que pueda proporcionarse a las familias; es el que puede, además, satisfacer la necesidad tan sentida hoy de medios para favorecer la vida de relación entre las familias decentes y honradas que no podían frecuentar ninguno de los espectáculos existentes desde algún tiempo hasta hoy.

Aun los que no vayan, pues, porque pudiera perjudicarles, acuérdense del prójimo necesitado de tan importante obra y apóyenla también para que pueda conservarse con el mayor esplendor, a fin de que tenga la fuerza de atracción suficiente para extender su acción moralizadora, como uno de los mejores elementos para alcanzar la regeneración de las costumbres que con tanto empeño las sectas procuran corromper.

Como observaba muy bien el Rdo. Sr. Gatell, cura-párroco de la Colegiata de Santa Ana de esta capital, «hoy se ha opuesto la obra de perversión popular a la obra de educación popular de la Iglesia», y para atajar y reducir la acción de aquella entendemos que los hijos de la Iglesia debemos considerar el teatro moral, no solo como obra del apostolado cristiano y moralizador, sino como obra de patriotismo y civilización.

La valía de este elemento ya La Hormiga de Oro la indicaba en los artículos citados, y en el mismo sentido se han pronunciado publicaciones como Razón y Fe, La Lectura Dominical y El Iris de paz, y varios Prelados, de los cuales solo podemos citar el Obispo de Málaga, porque, aunque sabemos de otras muchas autoridades eclesiásticas que también han hecho algo para ver si se conseguía establecer el teatro saludable, no hemos de sacar a colación sus afirmaciones hechas en terreno puramente privado.

Para dar una idea de la esplendidez de la Empresa del Teatro principal de Santa Cruz, diremos que se inauguró con una verdadera originalidad teatral; con la visión legendaria de Lo compte l'Arnau, para la que fueron pintadas cuatro nuevas decoraciones completas y dispuesto rico vestuario.

Y basta decir que en la presentación de las demás obras que han seguido después, ha presidido la misma riqueza y buen gusto.

Sebastián J. Carner."

"El artista Graner, al poner en práctica su gran idea de exhibición de cuadros plásticos y musicales con el nombre de Espectáculos y Audiciones, se propuso, por lo visto, varias cosas y, entre ellas, la moralización del "Teatro", pues habíamos llegado a un extremo en el que la inmoralidad y malas costumbres habían invadido por completo los escenarios del modo más descarado. Este lo ha conseguido, pues en su teatro nos exhibe funciones que son el ejemplo de todas las virtudes, con lo que ha hecho muy bien. Es lástima que no haga unas sesiones exclusivamente para la clase obrera a precios sumamente reducidos, en competencia con los teatros inmorales, que no dudamos que estarían muy concurridas y en ellas el obrero se moralizaría e ilustraría a la vez.

"La cançonística i la llegendària catalanes han trobat en els Espectacles-Audicions Graner una nova forma de manifestar-se que ajuda poderosament a l'actual resurrecció de la seva popularitat. Casi diríem que la manifestació artística del sentiment popular ha arribat a l'apogeu del seu desenrotllo, si no fos que del moviment de la cultura actual i d'en Graner, per lo que toca a aquesta manifestació en particular, cal esperar-ne més. Per això els literats, poetes, artistes i músics més notables de la nostra terra cooperen tots a l'obra d'en Graner, cada un en la seva especialitat, cada un amb els coneixements de la matèria que conreu, i això fa que en una cançó que de tan sabuda ja no ens afecti, i que en una llegenda que de tan vulgar ja no ens emocioni, puguem descobrir noves fonts emotives en el seu esperit després d'haver-se reencarnat en la imaginació del poeta, en la inspiració del músic i en la visió del pintor.

Això pensàvem, mentre pel davant dels nostres ulls passaven els diferents aspectes de la visió de la llegenda montserratina [Fra Garí] i delectaven els nostres ulls els sentits i melodiosos acords amb que el mestre Morera ha il·lustrat les visions".

Comentaris a favor de l'òpera de gran format

"Teatre popular

A l'amic Gual

(Acabament)

La història de la poesia n'està plena d'exemples d'afortunades adaptacions escèniques de llegendes populars. Podem dir, en general, que el teatre nacional de tots els països no és més que la dramatització de llurs gestes històriques o llegendàries i la plasmació de llurs hèroes besllumats fins llavors al través dels vels de la llegenda. Així, doncs, a tots els que tenim un viu interès en la formació d'aquest teatre nacional de la nostra Catalunya, basat en les cançons i llegendes de l'antigor, no ens manquen pas models en els quals ens puguem alliçonar i inspirar. Tots els temps, totes les civilitzacions ens en ofereixen a desdir. No tenim més que triar i aplicar encertadament els procediments d'adaptació més acomodats al caràcter de la nostra llegenda.

[...] Per voler fugir d'aquestes regions conscients de l'esperit en les quals vol la natura que l'art se manifesti, per voler deixar els eterns motllos que el geni de la humanitat senyala per a l'encarnació visible de tota obra artística, és, en el meu concepte, que ha resultat estèril la generosa temptativa de Maeterlinck, al voles espiritualitzar ultra mesura el teatre modern. L'ànima necessita un cos, la forma necessita matèria, el sentiment i la fantasia necessiten expressió transparent, i si aquest cos, aquesta matèria i aquesta expressió reneguen del seu ofici de símbol i representació, si volen eteritzar-se fins arribar a confondre's amb la cosa simbolitzada, amb la força espiritual que estan destinades a contenir, fent-se obscures, vagues, caòtiques i barbotejants, volent abismar-se en les tenebres de lo subconscient, com flors que volguessin confondre's amb les rels, llavors l'obra d'art així produïda podrà ser una exquisidesa, objecte de culte d'uns quants iniciats, però mai podrà reclamar la popularitat, la glòria de la universalitat, mai farà bategar el cor de les multituds, mai podrà arribar a constituir-se en exemplar d'un art humà i universal. Aquests són els perills més imminents que tenim d'evitar al posar les mans en aquestes glasses subtils i torcejades de les nostres velles cançons per a brodar-hi les flors de la nostra pròpia inspiració. Curem que el brodat tingui relleu i matís brillant i que l'obra ja finida no fugi ni es fongui com un núvol inconsistent al desplegar-la a la viva llum del sol.

I per lo que es refereix a la nova forma lírica-dramàtica (així podem calificar els assajos d'adaptacions escèniques del nostre romancer que han pres vida al Principal) que vós, amic Gual, veure concebir en un moment feliç, cal anar amb molt de compte per a que no resulti un gènere híbrid, un tipo amfibi de literatura, una cosa manquée que desfiguri per una part l'element poètic de la llegenda i que sia, per una altra, una veritable atròfia de drama líric.

Aquest nou gènere ha d'ésser (i el vostre ideal deuria ésser aquest quan ne tinguéreu la primera concepció) una llegenda glosada i un drama condensat, compenetrats ambdós elements en íntima fusió per medi de la música; en un mot, un corol·lari del drama musical de Wagner; una flor humil, però sadollada de perfum, nascuda entre les pedres del gegantí monument wagnerià. La música té de reconstruir el seu fons veritable d'expressió artística; ella és la qui ha de fondre els elements dramàtic i llegendari qui componen l'obra; ella té d'ésser l'ossatura de l'organisme qui posi en íntima relació aquests elements, que altrament fora molt difícil d'articular l'un amb l'altre.

D'això es dedueix que es té d'aplicar al nou gènere el mateix procediment usat per Wagner en les seves creacions musicals. El poeta en la seva tasca té de despullar la llegenda de tot detall històric, de tot caràcter que limiti l'assumpte a un temps i a un lloc determinats i deixar-hi només que el fons essencialíssim, l'element etern i universal. Llavors el músic se troba voltat de la seva pròpia atmosfera de pura espiritualitat i la seva volada es desplega sense cap obstacle que l'aturi. És el músic d'una delicadesa tan extremada que no pot tastar ni assimilar-se cap fruit de l'arbre de la poesia, sense que abans no hagin despullat aquest de totes les pells exteriors, fins deixar la polpa del sentiment neta i pura, el fruit veritable que copa l'essència humana.

[...] Rebeguem sense repòs el nostre esperit en l'olímpica claror del nostre Mediterrà; ell ens purificarà de ferestes boires i ens dirà entre el seu dolç murmuri el secret de gran art llatí, del que han tingut de venir a aprendre tots els grans artistes del Nord.

I vós, amic Gual, rebeu la meva coral felicitació per l'èxit dels vostres Tres tambors i Déu vos dongui forces per a continuar l'obra de popularització per vós concebuda.

Manuel de Montoliu"

"Ens hem refermat en la opinió que donàvem a Joventut després de sentir per primer cop a la "Wagneriana" alguns fragments de Bruniselda [òpera d'Enric Morera]. Hi veiérem un èxit, i l'èxit ha vingut, franc i espontani; èxit més d'impressió que d'anàlisi. Bruniselda es més petita que Empòrium, però, tal vegada degut a n'això mateix, penetra millor en l'auditori.

Empòrium es més per a l'esperit; Bruniselda més per al cor. El primer és un mosaic de savis estudis, de consciençuts tecnicismes; la segona vessa d'inspiració, és fecunda en ingenuïtat i frescor.

La música d'Empòrium ens allunya insensiblement del mestre, al travers dels segles, enllà, vers les grans edats heroiques. La de Bruniselda ens l'acosta al cor, a l'artista català, que ens retorna les belles llegendes, els cants d'amor de la vellúria, els lais dels trobaires de la Catalònia amiga. I en això consisteix el mèrit de Bruniselda. en la seva poesia de les afraus pirenaiques, en el perfum de la terra nostra i de ses ginesteres, que al travers dels segles ens retornen cada any el mateix encens que flairaven en les mates florides d'or les dames de Pallars, d'Osort, de Moncada, dalt de llurs turons encara avui impassibles i fecunds...

Del llibret dels senyors Puigdollers i Masriera podem dir que hi ha algunes boniques flors en mig de molta palla. Però, així i tot, quant millor no encaixa amb la musica que no pas l'italià que hi han enganxat amb tot l'encert possible, però amb un resultat... desastrós!

En resum: l'obra és bella, però tal com és presentada, un xic petita per a l'escenari del Liceu.

Senyor Graner, què hem de fer? Que no hi ha ànims per a atendre a lo que els barcelonins i els catalans en general demanem temps ha? Òpera catalana, òpera bona i conscienciosa. Amb els elements artístics amb què vostè compta, amb un Gual sobre tot tan exquisit i depurat director d'escena, amb intèrprets catalans com podríem tenir, coneguts uns, per conèixer altres. No se sent vostè prou valent per a donar a l'Art Català lo que li manca, els elements necessaris a son esplai i desenrotllament?

Francament, voldríem veure-la en el Principal, Bruniselda, tal com podria allí presentar-se. Crec que hi guanyaríem tots.

Valoració al final de la temporada

"Han tancat el Principal i el Romea, els dos teatres catalans.

Si recordem les obres estrenades, cal que reconeguem que la temporada que s'acaba de cloure no ha pas estat de les més dolentes per a l'escena de casa nostra. El Principal, en el nou gènere de les visions musicals, ha donat a conèixer produccions ben dignes d'estima: recordeu El comte l'Arnau, Els tres tambors, La presó de Lleida... [...]

No sabem els intents que pugui tenir en Graner per a la temporada vinenta. Però, si vol tornar a fer teatre català, li aconsellaríem que emprengués una marxa segura i perseverant cap a un determinat fi, sense vacil·lacions ni dubtes... «Que vol fer comèdia? Doncs cops a la comèdia! Que vol fer teatre líric? Doncs, que es prepari amb anterioritat a l'obertura de la temporada, que convidi a treballar als escriptors y als musics i ja veurà si en surten de visions musicals hermoses i de sarsueletes eixerides.

Però, sobretot, res de voler fer masses coses d'un plegat, perquè el públic se distreu i els espectacles se'n ressenten, a causa de que els encarregats de presentar-los no els poden dedicar tota l'atenció, per tenir-la repartida en una pila de coses: —masses coses...— [...]

Discussió Tintorer-Gual sobre les empreses de teatre català

"De teatre català

[...] L'esforç més serio que s'ha fet aquí per a ennoblir l'escena catalana és el d'en Gual, ànima del Teatre Íntim, qui, — i és ben trist el dir-ho,—segons totes les probabilitats, ha vingut a fracassar definitivament al Principal dels Espectacles-Audicions Graner.

I dic fracassar definitivament, puig el Teatre Íntim, després de la desfeta d'en Graner amb qui, potser un xic lleugerament, lligà la seva sort, ni moral ni materialment podrà tornar a ésser lo que era. En tot cas tindrà de renéixer de les seves cendres després d'un llarg període de gestació.

I encara és dubtós que totes les energies i tota la constància d'en Gual, si per un cas torna en Gual a la lluita, sien suficients per a retornar-li aquell vigor moral i físic — si se'm permet la paraula— que havien fet de l'honorable institució l'esperança més sòlida i l'element imprescindible de la futura regeneració del teatre de la nostra terra.

Emili Tintorer (seguirà)"

Joventut 340 (16/08/1906), p. 523.

"(Continuació) Res més podem apuntar en l'actiu d'en Graner. Ell volgué assumir la direcció suprema de tot i li mancaven les qualitats més elementals. Prescindim de la part econòmica o administrativa que desconeixia en absolut, i que en un teatre és d'una complicació tal que sols els homes que no han fet altra cosa durant tota sa vida en coneixen regularment el mecanisme. N'hi ha tants de forats en un teatre i els diners s'hi fan tan fàcilment fonedissos!... En fi,— puig no ve a tomb especificar-ho, — pot ben afirmar-se sense necessitat de provar-ho que una de les causes del desastre d'en Graner se deu al seu desconeixement absolut de lo que econòmicament representa un teatre. Mes això, poc ens interessa.

Lo més grave és que si econòmicament no hi entenia res, literàriament encara hi entenia menos. En primer lloc en Graner va mostrar tot seguit el seu esperit sectari. Sectari en el doble sentit d'intolerant amb lo que ell creia immoral, i d'exclusivisme envers determinades manifestacions de l'art. I aquesta doble intolerància la portà a un tal extrem que els Espectacles-Audicions Graner quedaren tot seguit segellats amb la marca de catòlics. Lo qual encara que no ho sembli representa una antítesis irreductible. Un teatre catòlic és teatre mort. Perquè a un teatre catòlic no solament no hi va el gran públic, ni el públic aficionat, sinó que tampoc hi van els catòlics convençuts; puig que aquests sols per excepció van a cap teatre.

I així resumint —no hi ha necessitat de demostrar-ho, puig els fets coneguts de tothom ho han demostrat— en Graner qui allunyà del Principal a la gran massa del públic complex refiant-se de l'alta burgesia barcelonina, se trobà amb que aquesta no respongué o respongué molt feblement a la seva crida. I lo més grave del cas és que encara que hagués respost, el fracàs era també inevitable. Hi ha un principi polític que la historia no ha mai desmentit que és el següent: Jamai una revolució es pot fer mercès a l'esforç d'una sola classe social. Aquest principi pot aplicar-se també a l'art serio. Tanqueu els pisos quart i quint del Liceu i a pesar de tot, a la curta o a la llarga tot espectacle que allí donguin, per perfecte que sia morirà.

En Graner pràcticament ha experimentat els efectes d'aquesta veritat. Ell va creure que a Barcelona hi havia un nucli prou gran de catòlics convençuts, quin pudor extremat i quina senzillesa e ingenuïtat d'imaginació s'acontentava fàcilment; va creure que les criatures grans i xiques que hi ha a Barcelona no demanaven altra cosa que joguines i entreteniments senzills. I s'equivocà. Els catòlics i les criatures per a omplir cada nit un teatre hi són, però prefereixen entretenir-se tots sols en la casa llur, puig que ben mirat un teatre sempre té quelcom d'infernal. Quasi bo és una calaverada anar al teatre, encara que fos al d'en Graner.

Així totes les tradicions artístiques i literàries del Teatre Íntim quedaren desfetes des de les primeres representacions. Tot el teatre modern, nacional o estranger —al dir teatre modern, clar és que em refereixo al verament interessant, d'obres insubstancials se'n han fet i poden fer-se'n sempre— quedava descartat. Res d'idees capficadores, res de conflictes emocionants, res de psicologies subtils. Tot devia ésser de tonalitats grises; distreure honestament, divertir-se acaronant la imaginació suaument per a preparar una son dolça, angelets de blanques ales, qüentos de color de rosa, prínceps blaus, princeses vaporoses, dames i cavallers, patges i serventes, paisatges i castells... tot de país de vano...

¿Què s'havia fet d'aquell ideal que perseguien en Gual i el Teatre Íntim?

Donar a conèixer el gran teatre nou, d'idees vàries, però excitadores; de conflictes punyents, de visions extraordinàries, discutibles per uns i per altres, però apassionadors per a tothom! Idees i conflictes qui fuetegen les penses, qui remouen els cors, qui exciten els nervis, qui revolucionen els esperits i fan plorar i fan riure, fan fruir i patir, fan meditar i emocionen, en una paraula: fan viure sotraguejant-nos la vida. Tot s'havia fos. En Gual i els seus companys deixaren d'estudiar la vida nova, ja es limitaren a contemplar i copiar fidelment els vells retaules. I ja sols lo extern d'aquests els seduí.

I els antics aficionats, novells actors, deixaren poc a poc d'ésser actors per a convertir-se en ninots decoratius, qui avui sortien en un quadro plàstic cantarellejant sota vels vaporosos, melodies tendres; demà enfosquien la veu per a mistificar les extravagàncies de sers esperitats, i demà passat vos declamaven cadenciosament versos sentenciosos qui no comprenien, o recitaven vulgaritats inacabables, de petites comèdies de saló. Ja no estudiaven, ja no procuraven encarnar essencialment un tipo humà; els actors del Teatre Íntim ja es limitaven a vestir oripells i gales, adoptant poses amb més o menys d'encarcarament. Ja lo que havien de dir era lo secundari, ja lo que havien de fer o figurar era lo primordial. Què té d'estrany que s'abarraganessin, que s'amaneressin i que acabessin com acabaren quasi bé sens excepció per recitar com reciten la lliçó els nens d'estudi qui de cor l'aprenen?

Heu-se-la aquí l'obra d'en Graner en sa relació amb el Teatre Íntim. Ell l'ha desorganitzat materialment, i lo que és pitjor, l'ha desorientat i desil·lusionat moralment. És mort o tornarà a renéixer? Els fets ho diran. Jo, però, crec que és ben mort i que serà inútil tot intent de rejovenir-lo.

“A l’amic Tintorer

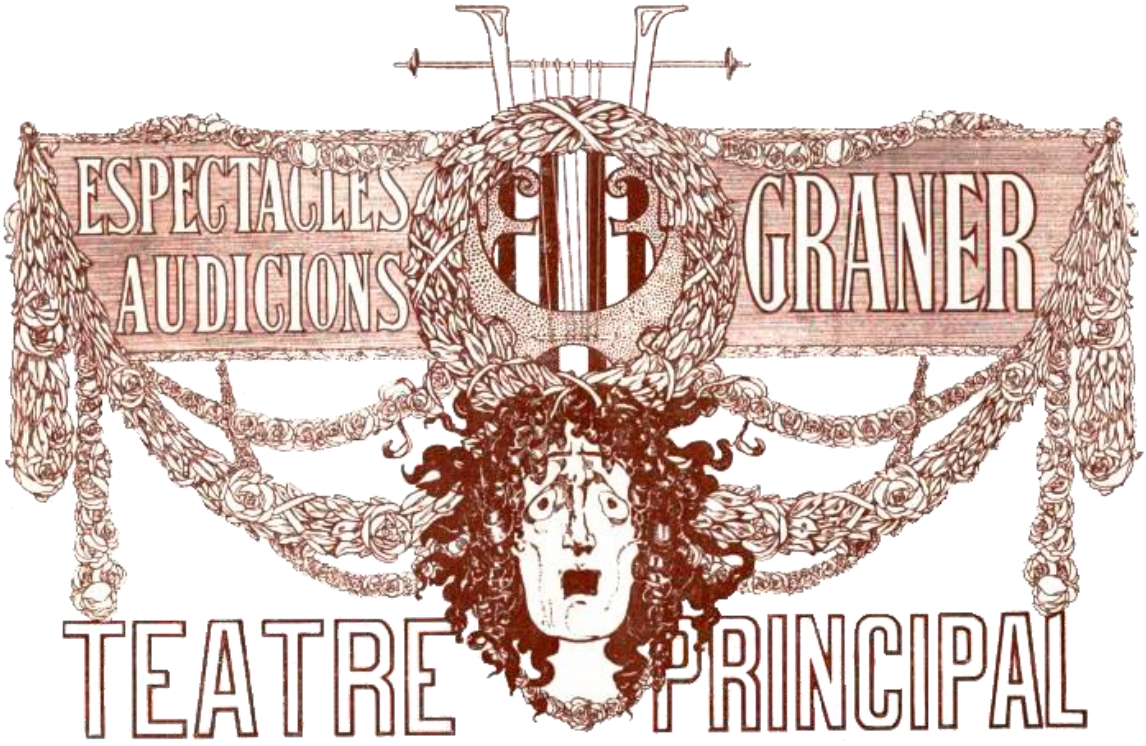
Vaig llegir, setmanes enrere, uns articles vostres sobre el Teatre Català, en els que em sorprenia extraordinàriament el decret de mort que amb ells, donàveu al meu Teatre Íntim, Fundant-vos en la fusió d’aquest Teatre amb els Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Si dic que va sorprendre’m, es perquè enlloc he sabut trobar els motius que ocasionessin tan funest decret, i també perquè no estava fet a llegir de vós res que careixés en absolut de fonament. I com que això no pot ésser degut més que a un malentès d’aquells a que tots estem exposats, jo vull posar-lo en clar, anch que no sia més que pel bon afecte i amistat sincera que entre nosaltres existeix, qual durada desitjo tant, qual durada no té mai d’estroncar-se.



Una de les formes que més forces i claredat donen als pactes i als propòsits dels homes, és aquella d’estampar-los amb clares lletres i a la llum del sol posar-los, perquè tothom se’n enteri: davant de tan franques explicacions poden caber-hi suposicions, dubtes, interpretacions de totes menes, però pel sol fet d’ésser tals, mai podran ésser donades com cosa certa. Els cartells de la tongada passada al teatre Principal deien: Espectacles-Audicions Graner. Direcció general. Lluís Graner. I els dies de representació dramàtica s’hi afegia modestament, després del títol de l’obra representada: Direcció escènica d’Adrià Gual. Crec que amb aquesta reproducció de lo estampat, n’hi ha de sobres per a fer-vos entendre que el Teatre Íntim no va mai tenir res que veure amb lo que en aquella casa es feia, en primer lloc per conveniència dels meus propòsits, i en segon lloc per haver-se’m advertit de bon principi que la meva direcció d’escena en res se referiria al meu Teatre, ja que la moralitat del mateix havia donat massa que dir.

Jo, doncs, amic Tintorer, no era més que un humil contractat per a arreglar l’escena. Si hi vàreu veure amics meus fent comèdia, decoracions meves penjades i algunes de les nostres obres posades a escena, era degut no més al dret que tots ens creiem tenir d’acceptar quelcom que ens ajudi a viure, en espera d’aquella protecció somniada i mai arribada, que ens permeti fer les coses com hem predicat, com les farem un dia o altre. Tot plegat misèria, però mai deshonestedat, doncs ben provat queda que per tots els medis possibles se va evitar que el nom de la meva agrupació-fantasma es malmetés en lo més mínim.

Després de nou anys d’un treball penós i esforçat, resulta altament trist veure’s obligat a confessar aquestes coses; però són tan certes, que d’altra part dona bo de dir-les, i és que a casa nostra, bon amic, no tot lo sincer té aquella acceptació que es mereixeria pel sol fet d’ésser tal, i un sens nombre d’elements, de vegades els que de lluny semblen més obligats, fins en bé propi, a dar empenta a certes iniciatives, se complauen en llur labor oculta i detractora, promoguda per petites passions, que en el fons destrueixen tantes llegendes!... I no parlem dels elements poderosos (?) i no parlem de l’opinió pública ni dels seus representants. Per a anar endavant en tota empresa cal revestir-la de colors atraients, emparar-la d’una mentida comparable a lo que és la mel per a les mosques o a lo que la llum pels papallons. Si no es fa així, el fracàs les volta entre la distracció de la massa que es diu culta i la mala intenció dels experts, dels pràctics. Però quan s’està convençut de lo que es fa, el fracàs no pot fer més que voltar com un borinot rondinaire: molesta... i res més. Per fi el moment arriba de dar-li el cop mortal. Vol paciència, però, en el fons, costa ben poc matar-lo. [...]

Temporada de 1906-1907

Direcció Artística:

Lluis Graner

Inauguració 20 Setembre

Temporada 1906/07

Aquesta temporada, amb el relleu en la direcció escènica d'Adrià Gual per part de Modest Urgell, mostra l'inici d'un canvi de tendència cap a posicions més properes al teatre còmic i cap a l'aglomeració de tendències teatrals dins del catalanisme, més enllà de la proposta única de visions musicals de caire simbolista defensada en la programació de la temporada anterior per Gual.

Si la temporada prèvia presentava un binomi de visions musicals i abonaments de teatre parlat, aquesta temporada deixa de banda el teatre sense música per desplaçar la seva programació cap a l'exclusivitat del teatre líric, però més dramàtic i amb més diversitat de gèneres. Les visions musicals ara seran més narratives i properes al drama líric, i estaran alternades amb operetes o comèdies líriques, incloent-hi fins i tot òperes de gran format més properes als posicionaments wagnerians, com ara el Hänsel und Gretel de Humperdinck o l'encàrrec de La santa espina.

Aquests posicionaments, per una banda, tenen a veure amb el canvi de la direcció escènica de l'empresa, però també pel context sociopolític del moment. Cal tenir presents els fets del diari Cu-cut! i el naixement de Solidaritat Catalana com a espai d'aglomeració política dels diferents partits catalanistes. En l'àmbit cultural, s'hi pot veure un paral·lelisme als Espectacles-Audicions Graner, que intenten igualment fer confluir les diferents propostes escèniques de teatre líric català dins de la seva programació, constituint així el teatre Principal com a espai de reunió i unificació del catalanisme.

D'aquesta manera, podem trobar encara el segell distintiu de les visions musicals (tot i que d'estil més narratiu, com ara són La dama d'Aragó, Les calderes d'en Pere Botero o La resurrecció de Llàtzer), intercalades amb drames lírics (que mantenen la temàtica general ja sigui religiosa o mitològica, com són Gaziel o Nit de Reis), rondalles desenvolupades com a obres líriques de gran format (La santa espina, La nina dormida al bosc o Ton i Guida), i també comèdies musicals (moltes d'elles adaptacions o "trasplants" al català d'obres franceses, com Permeti'm!, Innocència o L'ajudant).

Quant a l'estructuració de la temporada, es poden separar clarament una temporada de tardor i una d'hivern. Inaugurada el 20 de setembre de 1906, la primera meitat de la temporada (fins a principis de gener) destaca pel gran èxit i presència de Nit de Reis i l'estrena de noves obres intercalades amb les represes de produccions de la temporada anterior (com Els tres tambors o La presó de Lleida) i obres líriques del repertori del Teatre Líric Català de Morera, com ara (La reina del cor o Picarol).

Després de les festivitats de Reis al gener, La santa espina inaugura la segona meitat de la temporada i acapararà gran part de l'atenció i sessions de la resta de la temporada, deixant de banda el repertori estrenat fins llavors. S'encarregarà La resurrecció de Llàtzer, dels mateixos autors, per fer de complement a l'obra. Ton i Guida i La nina dormida al bosc renovaran el repertori de cara a la primavera, mantenint el format de rondalla lírica de gran format.

Aquest serà el moment de major projecció de l'empresa, arribant a publicar-se múltiples notícies sobre La santa espina i La nina dormida al bosc a diaris fins i tot madrilenys, incloent-hi fotografies d'escena, que publiciten els Espectacles-Audicions Graner com un dels principals promotors del teatre català. Cal destacar, també, la quantitat de material publicitari que es va editar de La santa espina (fotografies, postals, retrats, etc.) i l'edició de la partitura del número de la sardana, que encara perviu a l'imaginari musical de Catalunya.

Cap a finals de temporada se celebren funcions extraordinàries i en benefici dels diversos actors de la companyia que introdueixen diverses funcions úniques de teatre parlat i algunes represes d'obres anteriors per diversificar el programa de cara a la clausura de temporada. Cal destacar que el teatre parlat, si havia estat molt present durant la temporada anterior amb els abonaments de vetllades selectes, en aquesta pràcticament no s'hi veurà fins als últims dies de la temporada. Només es mantindrà l'abonament dels "thés d'hivern" i, en canvi, es programaran molts més concerts de música. Per tant, l'oferta del teatre queda més especialitzada en l'aspecte musical, tant de teatre líric com de concert, després d'algunes crítiques al final de la temporada anterior que senyalaven la necessitat d'especialitzar el Principal en gèneres musicals i el Romea en gèneres dramàtics de text.

Tot i això, malgrat l'esclatant èxit d'algunes de les seves produccions, com ara la de Nit de Reis i, especialment, La santa espina, els problemes econòmics del propietari de l'empresa i els seus deutes creixeran pel caràcter deficitari dels espectacles. Segons alguns testimonis epistolars, l'èxit de La santa espina va ser alhora la condemna de l'empresa, perquè la quantitat de músics i actors necessaris a l'escenari per representar-la generava enormes despeses que la venda d'entrades no podia cobrir amb uns preus tan baixos per butaca. A més, la programació de rondalles líriques de gran format força a reduir el nombre de sessions diàries per qüestions de durada, cosa que implica també la reducció d'entrades venudes.

El 21 de maig de 1907 s'inaugura la temporada d'estiu, que només oferirà sessions de cinematògraf. La butaca amb entrada estaria al preu d'un ral, i el palco amb 6 entrades, a 2 pessetes.

Horaris de les sessions

	Horari d'hivern		Horari de primavera
	De dilluns a dissabte	Diumenges i festius	De dilluns a dissabte	Diumenges i festius
Sessions de tarda	15:00	16:00	17:00	15:30
	18:00			18:00
Sessions de nit	21:30	21:00	21:00	21:30
	22:30	23:00

*El canvi en el format de les obres produïdes a partir de La santa espina, d'obres d'un acte a rondalles líriques de gran format, força el canvi horari i que es redueixin el nombre de sessions diàries.

Extraordinàriament es tornen a augmentar a tres sessions diàries (15:00, 18:00 i 21:00) durant els dies de març que està en cartell La resurrecció de Llàtzer, estrenada per commemorar la 100ª representació de La santa espina.

[El programa de mà d'inici de temporada, en aquesta ocasió, no inclou els preus ni condicions dels abonaments ni les entrades].

[Les obres apareixen ordenades segons la data de la primera representació dins de la temporada. No equivalen, però, al nombre de representacions, que seria major, perquè les obres sovint es representaven en múltiples sessions dins del mateix dia.

Estan categoritzades en: original (producció lírica nova), original represa (ja estrenada a alguna temporada anterior), obra externa (producció lírica encarregada i estrenada prèviament per altra empresa), teatre parlat (obres teatrals catalanes sense música) i traduccions (obres dramàtiques traduïdes d'altra llengua). [33] El text va ser escrit el 1900 i publicat el 1916, però no s'estrenaria perquè Vives no va arribar a escriure la música.
[34] La seva estrena s'endarrereix fins a la següent temporada, 1907/08.
[35] La Revista musical catalana 33 (setembre 1906) anuncia a la p. 170 que l'obra està essent assajada al Principal, però no es va arribar a estrenar.
[36] Aquesta temporada es va estrenar a la sala Mercè Somni de Jacob, el projecte podria haver-se reduït de "trilogia bíblica" a una sola visió musical.
[37] A la premsa s'indica que van lliurar el text a l'empresari juntament amb La santa espina, però altres fonts bibliogràfiques indiquen que aquesta obra mai es va arribar a escriure. Es va substituir per La resurrecció de Llàtzer, readaptació d'una obra prèvia, probablement per accelerar la producció.
[38] Aquesta obra reutilitza un fragment del Jesús de Nazaret, dels mateixos autors, per acompanyar La santa espina en la commemoració del centenar de representacions.

- Obres líriques traduïdes o de repertori històric:

"Se sent la veu de Silvestre que s'acosta cantant." "Silvestre cantant a fora cada vegada més a prop." "Sileta ha anat a obrir la porta abans de la darrera estrofa."

"Sila, Sileta i Silvestre, que entra cobert de neu amb un feix de llenya a l'espatlla i la destral a la cintura. Entra en acabar l'últim vers i fa punt deixant caure el feix a terra."

"Sileta, espolsant-li la neu." [Silvestre] "Tot penjant la destral i espolsant el barret que penja igualment." "S'asseu en l'escó." "Pausa. Cadascú queda en son lloc ensopit i com si s'adormissin. De cop se sent trucar violentament a la porta." "Tornen a trucar."

"L'eminent Mtre. Enric Morera en l'actualitat està posant música a un llibre titulat Nit de Reis, de l'inspirat poeta Apel·les Mestres.

Després ne posarà també a un drama del distingit literat en Pompeu Crehuet, que porta per títol El Mestre, del que en tenim molt bones noticies.

No creiem il·lusionar-nos al preveure que en aitals obres la inspiració de l'aplaudit compositor es desarrollarà potent com en totes les que fins ara porta estrenades; esperant nosaltres amb vertader delit la representació de les mateixes per a poder aplaudir una vegada més a l'amic que és honra i gloria de la Música Catalana."

"Anoche se verificó la inauguración de la temporada en el teatro Principal, estando completamente llena la sala.

Después de la exhibición de algunas películas cinematográficas se estrenó Nit de Reis de Apeles Mestres y del maestro Morera. El celebrado autor de Margaridó ha puesto en acción un cuento, presentando a unos campesinos que en la pobreza tienen el corazón sano, practicando dentro de su estrechez el bien, alcanzando por su desinterés la posesión de un amuleto que le entregan los reyes magos en pago a haberles dado desinteresadamente hospitalidad y con el cual alcanzan riquezas. Pero como no siguen el consejo de usar el amuleto con moderación y la posesión de riquezas solo sirve para hacerlos de pésima condición moral, se acaba el poder mágico y vuelven a su honrada pobreza.

Apeles Mestres desarrolla el tema con sencillez, salpicando el diálogo con frases irónicas que celebró el público.

El maestro Morera dio ambiente a las situaciones, sobresaliendo entre los números musicales el sexteto de la entrada de los reyes que está tratado en cómico con aire retozón que mereció los aplausos del público y la repetición. También está bien de factura un minueto. El decorado de los Sres. Moragas y Alarma corresponde al crédito de estos escenógrafos."

"Ahí tenemos al bueno de Graner, que acaba de abrir el Principal transformado. Al verso ha sucedido la música, y a las candorosas bobadas del año pasado algo con más sustancia, sin que por tenerla puedan ofenderse los oídos castos de las siervas de María y los puros pensares de los hermanos del babero. Todo es compatible, y hasta la propia Venus Afrodita podría exhibirse en aquel escenario... a condición de vestirse de hija de María.

Ha roto el fuego Apeles Mestres con una leyenda dramatizada: Nit de Reis. Yo tengo una gran debilidad por Apeles Mestres, a quien considero como uno de los poetas más sinceramente delicados de este siglo positivista, alma de niño bueno en cuerpo de hombre. Su Nit de Reis debía ser algo como reflejo de las ternuras de este poeta y no lo ha sido. No: en Nit de Reis ha mostrado Apeles Mestres una faceta nueva, la de un humorismo finamente gracioso que yo no sospechaba en él. Nit de Reis es una pequeña opereta entretenida, amable, que hace sonreír sanamente a los grandes y entretendrá fuertemente a los pequeños.

Lo entrada cómica de los tres Reyes Magos es un atrevimiento que me hizo temer por la suerte de la obra; pero está hecha con tan honrada bonhomie que no solo venció al público, sino que fue el éxito de Nit de Reis, probándose una vez más que en arte todo es lícito a condición de estar artísticamente hecho. Cierto es que Morera ha escrito para este momento una música muy en carácter, que fue con justicia aplaudida.

Nit de Reis gustó, pues, mucho, y como sobre lo ya dicho se ha presentado como allí es costumbre, es decir, primorosamente, con una decoración de interior de una cabaña que es de lo mejor que han pintado Moragas y Alarma, no es mucho que comparando esto con las inocentadas del año pasado nos parezca inmejorable. Aunque la obra no tiene grandes dificultades de interpretación, quiero hacer mención de Santpere y de otro cómico que allí salió y creo se llama Morató, muy justo y gracioso en un tipo de los tiempos de la buena opereta.

¡Señor mío Jesucristo: mantén al Principal en la vía emprendida y que no vuelva a las santísimas insulseces de la temporada última!

"Conforme anticipamos, el jueves último tuvo lugar en el teatro Principal de Barcelona la inauguración de la temporada de invierno con el estreno de la obra lírica en dos actos Nit de Reis, letra del poeta D. Apeles Mestres y música del maestro don Enrique Morera, cuyo argumento está basado en un cuento popular muy original y en extremo agradable. La obra fue muy bien presentada y aplaudida, sobresaliendo algún número de música que tuvo de repetirsea instancia del numeroso público que llenaba por completo el antiguo teatro.

"Ja tenim els teatres catalans en doina. Any de bé sigui!

El dijous al vespre va obrir el Principal amb La Nit de Reis, que és una rondalla escrita per l'Apel·les Mestres, musicada per en Morera i decorada per en Moragas i l'Alarma. Si els tinc de ser franc, a mi em diverteix molt aquella obra i al públic també.

Amb tot (com que un és crític), vaig a posar cara seriosa i a dir-ne un parell de coses als autors... Sí, senyors autors; tot això que ens expliquen m'ho planten al clatell. Potser sí que es creuen que un ve de l'hort per a empassar-se aquelles boles. I ara! Que no em vinguin amb romanços a mi: és inverosímil La Nit de Reis. Ves a on han vist que passessin aquelles coses... i doncs, hombre!

Figurin-se que surten els tres Reis amb el nas fet un glaç. Mentida! I la Paricio, que figura la dona d'en Santpere, els convida a menjar farinetes. I quan els tres personatges s'han atipat, donen a en Santpere un fluviol, amb el qual podrà complir tots els seus desitjos sense necessitat d'altra cosa que de fer-hi una refilada a cada desig. Mentida, vaja! Per qui ens han pres, ai coix!... I tot és així, eh? Que en Santpere o la Paricio o la Ferràndiz (la filla del matrimoni) volen una taula amb un bon sopar: doncs, zup!, surt la taula... Que volen uns bons sillons per seure: doncs, zast!, surten els sillons... Que volen uns vestits ben macos: doncs, pam!, els cauen els que duen i es troben tots mudats. Però aleshores noten que els vestits nous són prims i no guarden gaire del fred... Ah, sí? Doncs, cop de fluviol! I tot seguit surt un biombo que els guarda de l'aire acanalat de la porta... Res, vaja, mentides, mentides i més mentides. Sort que al cap d'avall, després d'una pila de peripècies que si no tingués tard explicaria, resulta que tot ha estat un somni.

De totes maneres, un hi passa una bona estona veient tot allò. I com que les mentides són d'aquelles que no fan mal, res!, un se sent inclinat a perdonar i a tornar un altre dia a veure l'obra i a sentir de passada la música alegroia que hi ha posat en Morera i a contemplar les boniques decoracions d'en Moragas i l'Alarma. “Espectacles Graner

La Nit de Reis, d’en A. Mestres i en E. Morera, posada en escena per en M. Urgell.

Lo gran poeta en aquesta obra no ha pas encertat desenrotllant una faula, atractívola potser al llibre, empro que resulta massa innocent al teatre. Lo músic ha complert no més que amb lo compromís. Té un moment feliç; quan la entrada dels Reis, que dona lloc a un nombre brillant. No sabem com explicaria l’aire de minuet a l’Edat Mitja en aquell conat de ball de bastons.

Les decoracions força desgarbades. Particularment la del quadro primer que semblava construïda de retalls i la del segon era de tonalitats enfarinades i d’estil arquitectònic indefinible. No es veig enlloc la direcció artística. Los trajos, alguns de mal gust, altres bruts i mal-girbats. La llum mal repartida i les transicions sobtades. Les figures no es posaren bé ni es movien amb seguretat. La desil·lusió que vàrem sofrir la vetlla inaugural, nos suggerí una pila de pessimistes reflexions.

En Graner s’ha penedit d’ésser bo. Ha perduda la fe que li conqueria simpaties fins dels qui eren més enemics de la seva obra. No li deurien sortir los comptes i pensa fer les paus aquesta temporada. Lo públic que li plauen los passatemps acut enganyat al vell teatre; que no se’n fiï massa.

Fora d’aquella casa la gent qui era una garantia; suprimit tot lo seriós; allunyat tot lo que constituïa un destorb al negocis, tenim l’artista rumbós transformat en empresari que compta. Ja està orientat ara; ja sap lo que cal per no perdre diners; presentar quatre insubstancialitats mal vestides. Bon començ!

Catalònia 10 (29/09/1906), p. 7.

El tema és senzill. Uns pobres bosquerols donen acolliment als Reis durant les inclemències d’una nit de llops: els Reis, no tenint cosa millor amb què pagar l’hostatge, donen al cap de casa un fluviol, amb el qual podia complir tots els seus desitjos sense necessitar altra cosa que fer una tocada; els desitjos, modestos de primer entovi, van creixent i creixent i acaben per pujar al cap de la família, que no es recorda de donar un bri de la felicitat que li sobra, a tants infeliços com n’estan mancats. I tornen els Reis i reclamen el fluviol , i la família es torna a trobar dintre de la seva humil cambra... Tot plegat no ha estat més que un somni de l’home, que, tot esperant el sopar, s’ha adormit com una marmota.

Aquesta petita acció va hermosament brodada amb un seguit d'incidents còmics que fan riure de gust, ajudant-hi bona cosa la música humorística que hi ha intercalat en Morera, entre quals trossos mereix ser esmentat el de l'entrada dels Reis.

Les decoracions, dels escenògrafs Moragas i Alarma, són ben notables: la de la cabana per la seva composició y la seva justesa; la del castell per la seva fantasia. [...]

Aquesta obra en dos actes, que el poeta ha calificat de conte de la vora del foc, entretingué joiosament a la concurrència per son moviment i per son espurnejant diàleg, encara que algun cop la nota còmica resulta un xic extremada. La il·lustració musical, deguda al mestre Morera, és feta sense pretensions, i es comprèn, perquè el llibre no demana pas altra cosa ni es presta a gaire lluïment.

"Al Principal s'ha celebrat la centena de Nit de Reis i a Romea l'aniversari de Les garses. El teatre català ha estat, doncs, de festa en els seus dos aspectes líric i dramàtic. El públic, amb els seus aplaudiments, ha sancionat dues obres que són dos models dintre el seu gènere.

L'Iglésias és el dramaturg del poble. [...] En canvi, l'Apel·les Mestres va per altres camins i la seva obra d'autor escènic té una altra significació. No ho són pel poble —per lo que se sol entendre pel poble— les produccions teatrals de l'Apel·les Mestres. "Principal.— Les funcions d'innocents.

Per a celebrar la diada dels Innocents, la colla del Principal va representar —corregida i augmentada amb motiu de la diada— l'opereta còmica catalana Nit de Reis, fent-hi una pila de variacions que varen caure molt en gràcia al nombrós públic aplegat al local. Entre altres coses, en Santpere va canviar el flabiol per un fiscorn, en Balot va convertir-se de majordom en cuiner, en Tor va canviar la trusa per un trajo de frac, la Huguet va fer una baronessa tota roja i en Morató, en el baronet, va presentar-se amb calça curta, mitjonets, davantal i barretet de palla. En Puiggarí, en Giralt i en Ferràndiz —els tres Reis— varen comparèixer muntats en briosos rucs i en Puiggener, en el promès de la Ferràndiz (Sileta) va vestir de mozo crío, produint tanta impressió que el monyo de la Paricio va volar dins a les bambolines i hi va romandre penjar... En fi: broma seguida...

[...] En tota la funció no va haver-hi cap incident desagradable. No obstant, és de doldre l'exabrupte d'un pagès, baixat de Gratallops, el qual va produir una mica d'esvalot abans de començar la representació de Nit de Reis amb motiu d'haver-se presentat en Santpere, anunciant que el públic se'n prengués la bona voluntat, puig s'havien posat malalts alguns elements de la companyia. Un senyor de les butaques, el senyor V., va reptar en veu alta al pagès, anomenat G. La senyora M. i les senyoretes B. i P., esposa i filles, respectivament, del senyor V., varen tenir un fort espant. Per sort, l'acomodador M. va aconseguir apaivagar les raons, que varen promoure un espetec de rialles i aplaudiments."

Funció especial pel dia de Reis

"Demà i demà passat es farà una funció al teatre Principal que sens dubte omplirà de goig a tots els nens i nenes que concorrin a l'espectacle.

Durant la celebrada obra de l'Apel·les Mestres i el mestre Morera Nit de Reis, que es posarà en escena en celebració de la diada, se distribuirà a cada nen un fluviol per a que, com en Silvestre, puguin obtenir tocant-lo totes les joguines que desitgin. Després tindrà lloc un sorteig d'una sèrie de grans premis."

"Després de les funcions organitzades amb motiu d'inaugurar-se el monument d'en Pitarra, ben poca cosa s'ha fet de seriós. L'únic que ha torbat la monotonia del repertori conegut, han estat les innocentades.

La del Principal ha consistit en la introducció d'una pila de canvis incidentals en la Nit de Reis; la representació, amb el títol Una òpera modernista d'un arranjament basat en I comici tronati, i en una bromada feta per alguns actors que varen barrejar-se amb el públic, simulant un incident sorollós i simulant-lo amb tanta traça que una bona part de la concurrència no es va adonar de l'engany fins que va ser celebrat per la majoria amb una salva d'aplaudiments i un cor de rialles. "[…] Tuvo lugar la inauguración de la temporada con el estreno de la comedia lírica de Apeles Mestres y Enrique Morera, La nit de Reis.

«Cuento a la vora del foc» (cuento del hogar) subtitulaba su autor a la nueva obra, que es una bella fábula, cuyo fin es entretener al público, y a fe que lo consiguieron sus autores, con el graciosísimo libro, donde se nota la mano maestra de Apeles Mestres, y la agradable música que Morera escribió, con delicada inspiración.

He aquí el argumento sencillo, casi infantil, de la obra a que me refiero. Unos pobres campesinos reciben en su miserable choza la visita de los Reyes magos, a los que dan acogida hospitalaria en la fría noche llamada de Reyes. Aquella buena gente parte su frugal cena con los tres magos, los cuales, en recompensa de su caridad, les regalan una sencilla flauta que tiene la propiedad de conceder todo lo que desee su afortunado poseedor. Aceptan el regalo aquellas buenas gentes, y para cerciorarse del hechizo de aquel instrumento, solicitan una bien servida mesa, que repleta de manjares se les aparece en su miserable tugurio.

El talismán de los magos les proporciona riquezas y honores; pero sus dueños, satisfechos de su bienestar, bien pronto se olvidan de los menesterosos, con lo que aquel mágico instrumento pierde su hechizo, según les habían anunciado los Reyes. Llaman éstos a la puerta del palacio de sus protegidos y son rechazados por creerles mendigos, por los criados, quienes, ante la insistencia de aquellos tres hombres, dan aviso al dueño. Niega éste la entrada en su señorial mansión a aquellos desharrapados, y entonces el encanto de la flauta, aquel singular y pródigo hechizo, desaparece, y vuelven a encontrarse los campesinos, pobres y miserables como antes.

Coma ya hemos dicho anteriormente, el libro está admirablemente escrito, y la música, origínale inspirada, tiene algunos números notables, tales como el sexteto del primer acto, y un delicioso minué del segundo. La nit de Reis fue muy bien recibida por el público, que aplaudió infinidad de noches a los autores de tan linda composición teatral. "El éxito que obtuvo fue extraordinario, pues se representó por espacio de 135 veces. El asunto, sin ofrecer gran interés, da ocasión a escenas regocijadas, que producían la hilaridad del público. La música es muy retozona e inspirada, llamando la atención el número de salida de los Reyes, que se repetía todas las noches, y un schottisch."

"La compañía que actúa en el Principal estrenó anoche la visión musical, en tres cuadros, La dama d'Aragó, libro del señor Morató con música del maestro Esquerrà.

El libro pone en acción la canción popular del mismo nombre, parafraseándola con acierto y buscando dar plasticidad a los momentos en que el tema da lugar a la formación de conjuntos. El maestro Esquerrà glosa el tema musical popular y demuestra sus conocimientos técnicos, notándose en algunos momentos cierta monotonía de expresión.

Ha sido presentada la obra con vistosas decoraciones en las que el autor Sr. Brunet se ha preocupado poco del natural, buscando el efecto escénico con tonalidades brillantes. Algunos trajes son ricos.

Los artistas representaron discretamente La dama d'Aragó y los autores fueron llamados a escena al final de los cuadros segundo y tercero. La aplaudida compositora Narcisa Freixas ha puesto música al cuadro de costumbres ampurdanesas Festa complerta, de Felipe Palma, cuyo estreno se verificará el próximo sábado."

"[…] Lo digo porque del jueves acá no ha habido más que dos estrenos y ninguno de los dos pasará a la historia de los felices sucesos.

Fue el primero una visión musical titulada La dama d'Aragó, que hicieron en el Principal para acompañar a la deliciosa Nit de Reis, de Apeles Mestres y Morera. La tal dama pertenece al género simplicísimo que allí se cultivó el año pasado con una constancia digna de mejor empleo y del que resueltamente no gusta ni aun aquel público fácilmente contentadizo. El joven Morató, autor de la paráfrasis dramática de la popular leyenda de la «dama de Aragón», ha hecho cuanto podía hacerse con tan vago tema, y el maestro Esquerrà ha escrito la música con la mano izquierda. Del esfuerzo de ambos ha resultado una visión imprecisa, falta de interés —supremo recurso en el teatro—y un tanto fatigosa, de modo que de La dama d'Aragó solo quedaron en la retina del público la decoración del cuadro primero, muy acertadamente pintada por Brunet, y la simpática figura de la señorita Viola, que cantó su parte con voz pequeña, pero de agradable timbre. Hay que volver al género a que pertenece Nit de Reis, dicho sea con los necesarios respetos, en la que se ha probado que el interés y la sana gracia son perfectamente compatibles con los Mandamientos de la ley de Dios, las enseñanzas del Catecismo y las bendiciones de Su Ilustrísima, aunque claro está que hacerlo es algo más difícil que decirlo, como ya expuso el clásico escribiendo —ojo, compañero tipógrafo— que spiritus spirat ubi vult, o, en pedestre romance, que «no siempre está el horno para bollos». "[...] Vuit dies més tard [de l'estrena de Nit de Reis] seguí l'estrena de La dama d'Aragó, visió musical en tres quadros, lletra d'en Josep Morató i música d'Adrià Esquerrà. És una paràfrasi de la cançó popular del mateix nom hàbilment realitzada a l'escena i de la qual n'han tret gran partit el músic i el pintor. Les decoracions, degudes al senyor F. Brunet, són vistoses i de molta imaginació, especialment la del primer quadro, que és una exquisitat, i al bell efecte de son conjunt ha d'afegir-se la riquesa i bon gust dels trajos, d'un dibuix força elegant i d'una entonació molt ben harmonitzada.

El jove mestre Esquerrà, que l'any passat ens havia sorprès amb la joliua partitura de La sardana dels promesos, ha lograt novament un èxit amb la música de La dama d'Aragó. Més treballada que l'altra, la nova partitura resta no menys espontània, i és per això que tota ella es fa escoltar amb gust, encara que certa uniformitat de procediment la perjudica un xic cap al final. La variant de la cançó popular que ha utilitzat el senyor Esquerrà, si bé no es la més inspirada, té, en canvi, un bonic caient i està destrament glosada. El dia que la execució estigui més segura, no hi ha dubte que la obra en conjunt guanyarà moltíssim. La senyoreta Viola i els senyors Balasch i Puiggener, que han interpretat els papers principals, se feren mereixedors als aplaudiments de la concurrència. [...]"

Revista musical catalana 33 (setembre 1906), p. 170.

"La lletra és del meu amic íntim Josep Morató. Com que ell m'ha confessat ingènuament que el seu únic objecte no era altre que el d'ampliar la cançó popular per a donar ocasió d'esplaiar-se al músic i a l'escenògraf, deixaré la lletra de banda i diré que el mestre Esquerrà hi ha engegat un raig de nyigo-nyigo i de bum-bum i de trompetades que el Principal se n'omple d'aplaudiments. Ja es veu que és petit l'Esquerrà, perquè mou més remor que setze músics de tamany natural. En Brunet, més petit encara, ha pintat per al primer quadro una bonica decoració i per al segon i el tercer dues més. Per la seva banda la Viola fa una dama amb cada refilet de veu que no és pas estrany que en Balasch —sent com és un bon tenor— canti durant tota l'obra que s'hi vol casar. Lo que hi ha és que en Puiggener, que fa de germà de la Viola, de primer entovi no hi ve gaire bé. Lo que ell deu pensar: si en Balasch és tenor jo també soc un bon baríton i també fem una bona parella amb la Viola. Però a l'últim, un dia que els dos germans van a la fira, se'ls presenta en Balasch i els diu: «Al cap som: ¿se fa o no es fa el matrimoni?» I acaben fent-lo, però amb la condició de que en Puiggener també podrà anar a cantar en companyia dels esposos. I vet aquí que al acabar-se l'obra, surten la Viola i en Balasch de l'església i, junts amb en Puiggener i el coro general, ja fan una gran cantada amb la que acaba tot el tripijoc. [...]

"La dama d'Aragó, visió musical en tres quadros —un tríptic—, lletra del Sr. Morató, música del mestre Esquerrà, està inspirada en la cançó popular del mateix títol, com que és d'ella una espècie de paràfrasi plàstica. Escènicament està ben repartida i baix l'aspecte musical, el motiu de la cançó, que és el preponderant, no sempre ofereix aquella frescura que distingeix les cançons de la terra, i els trossos que res tenen que veure amb el tema descobreixen en el músic cert afany d'originalitat, que potser descobreix un xic massa l'esforç que fa per a aconseguir-ho. Tres decoracions del Sr. Brunet de molt efecte i una execució molt cuidada contribuïren a assegurar l'èxit de la nova composició que sigué rebuda amb picaments de mans."

La Esquella de la Torratxa 1449 (05/10/1906), p. 667.

"El mestre Esquerrà, autor de la part musical de La dama d'Aragó, ha sapigut fer-se del tot seu al públic, conseguint un veritable triomf per la inspiració de què ha fet gala. L'obreta, pertanyent al gènere de les visions, és en la seva part literària una ampliació de la cançó popular adaptada a l'escena. Ni el seu autor volia que fos altra cosa, ni podia ser-ho. Les decoracions d'en Brunet són d'efecte, produint-lo excel·lent la del primer quadro. La interpretació bona, sobretot per part de la tiple senyoreta Viola, del tenor senyor Balasch y del baríton senyor Puiggener. Els trajos rics i pintorescs.

"Estrenos de la setmana [...] La dama d'Aragó, de J. Morató i el mestre Esquerrà, pertany a un gènere ben distint de l'anterior [Nit de Reis], i mirant, doncs, l'obra pel cantó seriós és ben arrodonida i escrita amb coneixement de causa."

Festa complerta

Quadro de costums empordaneses.
Estrena el 29/09/1906.

Il·lustració 120: FREIXAS, Narcisa: Festa complerta (página manuscrita signada).

Lletra de Palmira Ventós (sota el pseudònim Felip Palma).

Música de Narcisa Freixas.

[Escenògrafs no identificats]

Text no localitzat.

Música: SGAE: BAR/B-72 i 72.1.

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

[La partitura té una cançó per a tiple, la cançó del cec (que es repetiria tres vegades en forma de coples, el bis de les coples (que toca una murga en lloc de l'orquestra) i una sardana durant la qual baixa el teló, que podria ser al final de l'obra].

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Un diàleg fluid i ric de vocabulari amb uns personatges ben característics, barrejats en una acció pintoresca, amb tocs psicològics observats d'artista: veus-aquí lo que és el quadro estrenat al Principal amb el títol de Festa complerta. Tal vegada l'excés d'estudi en el procés psicològic treu intensitat a l'acció, puig les coses que s'hi diuen ofeguen les que hi passen. Lo qual no vol dir que l'obreta no s'escolti amb gust, tant pel color local que l'avalora, com pel conflicte que s'hi planteja i que es circumscriu al cas d'una noia que dubta en prometre's a un home a qui no estima i se veu, en canvi, condemnada a viure sota el mateix taulat amb el que, havent despertat el seu primer amor, va casar-se després amb la germana d'ella. La cosa acaba amb la resolució d'acceptar al pretendent, lo qual desemboira certes tenebrositats que hi havia en la conducta de la noia.

La senyora Freixas ha escrit per a aquesta obra alguns trossos de música senzilla i d'aire ben popular. Els actors varen interpretar Festa complerta amb amor, distingint-se en especial la senyoreta Paricio i la senyora Huguet i els senyors Puiggarí, García i algun altre. Al final, varen haver-hi molts aplaudiments i cridades dels autors, que no es varen poder presentar per no trobar-se a l'escenari.

"Festa complerta, libro de Palma, con música de Narcisa Freixas.

Se ha estrenado en el teatro Principal Festa complerta, cuadro de costumbres empurdanesas, original de Felipe Palma, con ilustraciones musicales de Narcisa Freixas. Se trata de un cuadro hecho con soltura y con dotes de fina observación para reproducir costumbres, dialogado literariamente y revelando el autor conocimiento del corazón humano por la manera de exteriorizar los afectos, descollando entre los tipos el protagonista, el manxaire i la Laia.

No es una principante Narcisa Freixas, porque, entre otras composiciones, es autora de la obra Cançons d'infant, que le dio merecida fama. Las ilustraciones musicales que ha compuesto para Festa complerta la acreditan nuevamente, sobresaliendo la canción de Ciseta, de carácter popular y sentimiento dramático; el couplet del ciego picaresco e ingenioso; la caricatura del típico pasacalle de fiesta mayor y la sardana de marcado sabor popular y de fácil melodía.

Los autores fueron muy aplaudidos."

"[...] I això mateix dic a donya Felip Palma, autor del quadro de costums empordaneses Festa complerta, estrenat al Principal i basat en un tema semblant—però no tan grave—que va servir de base a en Zola per a La terre: Un home casat amb una dona i desitjós de ser-ho també amb la germana de la dona. De la qual germana està enamorat un minyó, al que ella no gosa dir que sí, perquè no ha arribat encara a avorrir al cunyat. Per fortuna s'hi fica el mestre del poble i entre ell i algunes notes de música de donya Narcisa Freixas acaben l'obra en pau i gràcia de Déu, sense que ni el cunyat ni ningú faci cap estropici. La interpretació ajustada, fent en Puiggarí un personatge ple de caràcter, i portant-se bé la Huguet, la Paricio i etc., etc. [...]"

Cu-cut! 228 (04/10/1906), p. 391.

"Amb el títol de Festa complerta s'ha posat en escena un quadro de costums empordaneses, d'acció molt senzilla, casi sense accidents que puguin despertar interès, però, en canvi, ben observat, sobre tot en lo referent a la pintura d'alguns tipos.

El nom de l'autor és nou: Felip Palma. Algú pretenia que és el pseudònim d'una senyoreta dotada d'una gran vocació pel cultiu de les lletres catalanes. Si és així, la felicitem perquè revela molt felices disposicions.

Exornen l'obreta alguns fragments musicals, deguts a Dª Narcisa Freixas, entre els quals s'hi destaca una airosa sardana.

En l'execució que sortí bastant esmerada es distingiren la Srta. Paricio i els Srs. Puiggarí, Morató i Balot."

“Estrenos de la setmana

[...] Festa complerta és un quadro de costums, original de Felip Palma, amb la col·laboració musical de Narcisa Freixas. Va ser escoltada amb gust, perquè les escenes estan desarrollades amb consciència, però hi manca l’acció teatral, que poc o molta és necessària en tota obra que es presenti en el reduït marc de l’escenari.

Modesta sala de treball del poeta. Xemeneia a dreta on espurneja el caliu; finestra a esquerra i porta al fons. Prop de la xemeneia, una taula coberta de papers i llibres, on a la claror d'una làmpara, escriu el poeta. Vora la xemeneia, un sillló. “Posa el buscall al foc i s’asseu en el silló vora la xemeneia amb ensopiment. La flama comença a desplegar-se xiulant i brunzint i es transforma lentament en una figura de foc asseguda sobre el buscall, que contempla somrient al poeta.”

"L'estrena de Gaziel, que devia tenir lloc aquesta nit en el teatre Principal, s'ha tingut d'aplaçar per no estar acabat el decorat. S'estrenarà dissabte, dia 27, a dos quarts de deu de la nit, en sessió triple."

El Poble català 255 (25/10/1906), p. 2.

"És la mateixa acció, desenrotllada a trossos, amb els mateixos versos del poema. Un poeta acaba la seva obra. És a la nit. Tira al foc el darrer buscall i el foc s' anima... Surt Gaziel d'entre les flames, disposat a fer tres dons al poeta... El poeta demana... «Primer, la glòria; després, l'amor...» «I després?...» No sap què més demanar el poeta, però el tercer do ja li concedeix el mateix geni que li acaba d'aparèixer... «No n'hi ha prou de la glòria i l'amor... Cal també la riquesa. I aquest és el tercer do que et vull oferir...» I el poeta, al segon quadro, ja és ric, ja és glorificat, ja és estimat per la dona que somniava, a la que troba en una gran festa carnestoltesca, que dona lloc a l'autor de la lletra a fer una escena molt eixerida entre gomosos, i al de la música, a encastar-hi una mena de brindis d'un sabor molt original.

Però ve la matinada. S'acaba la festa... El poeta torna a les seves golfes acompanyat de Gaziel... S'ha acabat la il·lusió... Ni riquesa, ni amor, ni glòria... Tot ha estat un somni; mentides... Prou que ho va dient el mateix Gaziel entre plany i plany del poeta... I el nombre musical que acompanya aquesta situació és també ben suggestiu, com ho és el gran duo entre el poeta i la seva estimada al quadro segon, com ho és el preludi exquisit amb que es prepara l'obra abans de començar-se el primer.

És una música senyora la que ha posat en Granados al poema. Senyora i inspirada i original. Per això el públic va aplaudir-ne l'acabament de cada tros. El decorat, degut a en Moragas i Alarma, és de molta justesa en l'interior de la casa del poeta i d'un extraordinari efecte en els jardins d'hivern on se desenrotlla el segon quadro. Fan una impressió fonda de realitat poètica aquells jardins. De la interpretació va dur-ne el pes en Santpere i la Paricio en els papers poeta i Gaziel. Tots dos varen aguantar els personatges amb fermesa. També mereixen aplaudiment i força el duo amb el poeta al segon acte, així com en Puiggener, qual brindis volia fer-li repetir el públic. Els demés, tots al seu lloc.

"Gaziel es el título del poema dramático del maestre en Gay Saber y eximio artista Apeles Mestres, con música de Enrique Granados y decorado de los Sres. Moragas y Alarma.

Pocas veces sucede como en el poema estrenado recientemente en el antiguo coliseo de la Santa Cruz que se fundan en la expresión de una idea, bastante abstracta, por cierto, tres elementos tan indispensables como el poeta, el músico y el decorador, y el éxito, superiorísimo en el concepto de las personas cultas, no haya determinado una explosión de entusiasmo en el gran público; la razón no puede ser más palmaria; el público que aplaude y ríe a mandíbula batiente la ejecución lamentable de Dos carboners, de cuya obra hablaremos luego, ni puede capacitarse de la transcendencia del poema de Apeles Mestres, ni puede comprender la relación íntima entre el poeta y el músico y por lo tanto entusiasmarse por la partitura del maestro Granados, solo puede apreciar un efecto transitorio en el decorado, como los exagerados efectos de luz en las escenas del segundo acto, perfectamente rectificables en cinco minutos.

Apeles Mestres, cuyo talento ha demostrado multitud de veces con la pluma y el lápiz en la mano, tiene a veces en su forma fisionomía altamente festiva y, por lo tanto, éxito inmediato por sus caricaturas y en la aparición de sus tres reyes, otra caricatura de buen género presentado ha poco en este mismo teatro, pero en el fondo es un poeta sentimental y delicadísimo, que entusiasma íntimamente, cuyos entusiasmos nunca se traducirán en explosiones de aplausos.

Gaziel no es ni el diablo ni el genio del mal, es sencillamente el espíritu de la realidad, que se aparece a un poeta soñador que ama a un ser ideal, desconocido, pero imaginado por el joven soñador. Gaziel hace que el poeta realice sus aspiraciones: una mujer ideal que encuentra en suntuoso palacio, colmada de riquezas, se enamora del poeta. Este, vuelto a la realidad, ofrece a Gaziel su sangre, su alma. El espíritu práctico desdeña esas antiguallas que nada positivo significan y deja al soñador entregado a la desesperante realidad de sus pobres medios.

Hay en la obra una escena en el segundo cuadro donde unos jóvenes al uso, muy puestos de frac y muy a la moda, execran de los sabios y poetas en lenguaje tan real, vulgar y cínico que casi raya en lo impúdico y soez; aquí el músico ha puesto un brindis lleno de efectos reales de la mejor ley y originalísimo. El dúo del poeta y su apasionada está en tiempo de waltz, de motivo sumamente fácil y un tanto vulgar, pero de efecto seguro. En los preludios y en todas las piezas la música de Granados es delicadísima y de efectos polifónicos exquisitos.

La decoración del segundo cuadro, modificando los efectos de luz, es de lo más hermoso que han producido los escenógrafos Sres. Moragas y Alarma. La ejecución no pasa de aceptable. Los autores fueron llamados al palco escénico, donde solo se presentó el Sr. Granados, por estar ausente Apeles Mestres.

Después de muchos años de no haber visto Dos Carboners, del viejo Eduardo Aulés, vimos reproducida esta obra en el Principal, y a pesar de su deplorable ejecución, todavía vibran aquellas notas de color local, tan exuberantes de vida y realidad, aquellas escenas dignas de D. Ramón de la Cruz, aquellos chistes que brotan tan oportunos y aquella fácil versificación, que no envejecerá jamás.

La vibración de su colorido siempre eclipsará esas medias tintas, convencionalismos y falsedades, hoy tan en uso, que caen en el ridículo cuando no las levantan unas manos maestras como las de los autores de Gaziel, Lo comte l'Arnau y pocas más."

La Publicidad 9998 (30/10/1906), p. 3.

"L'altra estrena de la setmana ha estat Gaziel, al Principal, música d'en Granados i lletra ¡ay! de l'Apel·les Mestres.

Veuran que sona el timbre, els musics ocupen els seus llocs, en Lambert dona cop de batuta i tiruliruliru, ziguziguzet, narinarinari, zum-zum, fusta i corda i una mica de metall, cargolen una simfonia. Després s'aixeca el teló i apareix en Santpere assegut prop d'una taula amb cara de tenir mal de queixal i estar tip de provar tots els remeis.

Tot d'una s'aixeca, s'acosta al foc com si li vinguessin ganes de tirar-hi el barret i aleshores compareix la Paricio vestida de dimoni. ¡Jesús, Maria, Josep! «¿Què desitges?» li diu la Paricio després d'una cantamenta; «La gloria i l'amor», diu en Santpere. «Teva es la gloria i teu és l'amor», fa la Paricio. I després d'unes altres cantamentes, surten uns criats, posen un pardessús a en Santpere i en Santpere se'n va amb la Paricio, que, per a provar-li que li ha donat la gloria i l'amor, el porta a un ball de disfresses. Un cop hi és, en Puiggener, en Tor i en Morató (R.) fan una pila de broma amb les criades i unes ampolles de xampany, i després surt en Santpere i en canta un altre rengle en companyia de la Viola. I es diuen que s'estimen i que cesta i que ballesta i que això i això i això altre. I que si l'amor i que si el cor, i que si el cor i que si l'amor i etc., etc.

Vet aquí que després s'acaba el ball i en Santpere torna a trotar-se a casa amb la Paricio, i tornen a cantar i parlar sobre si l'amor i la gloria i la riquesa. I la Paricio fuig i aleshores en Santpere veu que tot allò ho ha somniat. I el públic aplaudeix i crida a en Granados. I en Granados, amb tot i haver sortit al final del ball, ara no vol sortir i s'amaga. I si el públic el vol veure ha d'esperar-se una estona i anar-se'n Rambla amunt, que és el camí que emprèn el mestre al sortir del teatre.

Vostès diran què més hi ha en «Gaziel». Ja els ho diré: molta filosofia. ¡Uy! ¡molta! I després unes magnífiques decoracions d'en Moragas i l'Alarma. A la del segon quadro, que representa un esplèndid jardí, creguin que jo hi passaria els estius de tanta il·lusió com fa. No crec que s'estigui tan bé en cap torreta del Putxet. [...]

"[...] Darrerament s'ha estrenat el drama líric en un acte i tres quadros, Gaziel, lletra d'Apel·les Mestres i música del mestre Enric Granados. Deixant apart el llibret, inspirat en el poema del mateix nom, perquè no volem exercir aquí de moralistes, direm lo molt que ens ha plagut la música d'en Granados, feta amb aquella distinció i amb aquella delicadesa tant pròpies del seu estil personalíssim. Els inspirats motius de la partitura, realçats per una orquestració finament cisellada, no cal dir amb quin plaer són escoltats.

Entre els millors números de l'obra recordem el delicat preludi, la original cançó de Gaziel i el duo d'amor del segon quadro, el qual, basat en un ritme de vals, resulta, dintre el gènere teatral, de lo més poètic i exquisit que s'hagi escrit per a la escena. Per a la instrumentació d'aquest fragment en Granados ha aprofitat amb molt de tacte el seu instrument favorit, el piano, obtenint de son timbre, barrejat amb els de l'orquestra, sonoritats noves i efectes ben jolius.

El públic que assistí a les primeres representacions de Gaziel aplaudí cada número de música amb molt entusiasme i demanà al final de l'obra la presència del mestre Granados per a festejar-lo amb sos aplaudiments.

La interpretació fou molt acceptable per part de les senyoretes Viola i Paricio i dels senyors Santpere i Puiggener. Abans d'acabar no podem deixar de mencionar l'esplèndida decoració del segon quadro, obra dels reputats escenògrafs senyors Moragas i Alarma. [...]"

Revista musical catalana 34 (octubre 1906), pp. 192–193.

"[...] Pero, naturalmente, todo melodrama perturba algo al buen régimen cerebral, y hube de buscar ambiente más sereno en el Principal, donde tenía pendiente de examen el Gaziel que el maestro Apeles Mestres ha sacado de su poema del mismo título y al que Granados ha puesto música. Gaziel es una delicada filigrana, y por serlo no está al alcance del que los franceses llaman gros public. Es aquello en extremo tenue para percibido por todos los paladares, como perteneciente a un teatro de selección no asimilable todavía por la mayoría. Entre Nit de Reis, del propio Apeles Mestres, y Gaziel, el público seguirá optando por el primero.

Pero en lo que todos los gustos coincidirán es en cuanto al juicio sobre la música que Granados ha escrito para Gaziel y de la que separo con todos los respetos imaginables un dúo de amor que es sencillamente un prodigio de inspiración, de delicadeza y de maestría en el dominio de la orquestación. Podrá Granados escribir en lo sucesivo algo tan bueno como este soberbio dúo, pero no mejor. Por esta vez sentí que la *claqu*e, tan tiránica siempre, no lo fuese para repetir aquella admirable página musical. Muy bien, maestro.

La interpretación desequilibrada. Santpere hizo el poeta, papel que no es de su temperamento, porque esto chico ha venido al mundo para hacernos reír, y lo consigue siempre porque tiene gracia, pero no para hacernos sentir. Puiggener cantó con brío y sabor una canción báquica —¡una canción báquica en el Principal, señores! —, y las señoritas Paricio y Viola hicieron la primera un diablo muy aceptable, aun para aquel público devoto, y la segunda la mujer ideal del poeta, que a los herejes nos pareció diabólicamente bonita.

Moragas y Alarma —porque la muerte de Moragas pasó, afortunadamente— han pintado dos decoraciones, una de ellas, el jardín lleno de poesía y misterio en que el poeta y su amada cantan el dúo de que he hablado, verdaderamente magistral. Y aquí pondría punto si no creyese del caso someter uno al delicado gusto de Apeles Mestres, que huye instintivamente de lo extravagante y chabacano. Cuando Gaziel ha otorgado al poeta los tres dones, Gloria, Amor y Riqueza, asoman en la buhardilla unos criados de fraques negros y rojos que le llevan el gabán y el sombrero. Estas figuras dan en el cuadro y dentro del asunto una nota de extraña crudeza, chocan y hacen el desdichado efecto de los criados de un Círculo que dan la ropa al señorito cuando se retira a casa. Basta con que Gaziel diga, como dice, que el poeta es ya rico, célebre y amado, y que se lo lleve. Ya le vernos bien vestido en el cuadro siguiente, y daña al medio poético en que aquello flota la salida muda y en crudo de aquellas figuras de Casino con bacarrat y peluquería para los socios.

Si el maestro Apeles Mestres es de mi opinión suprima estas figuras innecesarias, y si piensa lo contrario, pues será la vez primera que no estemos conformes y yo me llevaré a la huesa este dolor de no haber pensado como aquel delicado poeta.

"Gaziel, poema líric-dramàtic, lletra d'Apel·les Mestres, música del mestre Granados.

És una obra ben poc teatral; ni la correctíssima forma poètica en què està escrita, ni la inspirada música, hermosament instrumentada, arriben a donar-li aquella vida i aquella plasticitat pròpia de les obres escèniques, i és perquè e1 poema d'Apel·les Mestres necessita per a entrar al cor, la solitud i l'abstracció de la lectura, i es difumina i perd tota la intensitat emotiva al trobar-se amb el convencionalisme de les taules.

Ademés, poeta i empresa han estat poc oportuns en fer anar Gaziel darrera la Nit de Reis, per les moltes analogies de construcció d'ambdues obres: pobres són els protagonistes de la Nit de Reis, per màgica arriben a la realització de sos anhels i per màgica ho perden tot, perquè tot era ficció: iguals tràmits regeix acció de Gaziel, i això perjudica a la nova obra.

El decorat, de Moragas i Alarma, magnífic, sobre tot el sumptuós jardí; la mise en escena bé, i encara ho estaria més si Gaziel, com a ser sobrenatural, anés sempre rodejat del llum Drumón, perquè perdés el caràcter de disfressa que ara a estones sembla tenir.

La música, a judici nostre, bona; i sobretot instrumentada de mà mestra, sobresortint el duo d'amor i la simfonia.

La interpretació justa, tant per part de la Paricio i la Viola, com d'en Santpere i d'en Puiggener, sobre tot del primer, que fa gala del seu notable talent escènic, amb la creació de la figura del Poeta, que tan poc apropòsit per al teatre, ha sortit de las mans d'Apel·les Mestres.

El Sr. Graner té un bon puntal en la companyia, amb el primer actor en Josep Santpere."

La Escena catalana 5 (03/11/1906), p. 3.

"[...] Gaziel no és altra cosa, literàriament, que l'adaptació al teatre del poema publicat anys enrere per l'autor amb el mateix títol. A estones fins els versos són els mateixos. Amb tot, s'han suprimit passatges del poema i se n'hi han afegit d'altres, com per exemple una escena entre gomosos al segon quadro.

El mestre Granados ha escrit per a Gaziel algunes pàgines de música distingidíssimes i inspirades que són escoltades a cada audició amb major complascència. Per la seva banda, els escenògrafs Moragas i Alarma han pintat dues bones decoracions, sent veritablement exquisida la del segon quadro, que representa un jardí d'hivern.

La Paricio i en Santpere aguanten bé els dos personatges principals de l'obra, o sigui, Gaziel i el poeta. En Puiggener canta magistralment un brindis del quadro segon i en Ramon Morató i en Tor, els dos gomosos que l'acompanyen, el secunden de la manera deguda en tota l'escena.

Gràcies a l'esforç dels actors, a la música i al decorat, l'obra arriba a sostenir-se, amb tot i mancar-hi prou acció per a que resulti teatral. [...]"

"Gaziel. — Excelente obra: su autor, Apeles Mestres, ha sido feliz en su concepción. No podíamos esperar menos de semejante poeta y más aún con el precedente de Nit de Reis, que fue un éxito como lo ha sida esta. En cuanto a la música, solo debemos decir que es del Mtro. Granados y que por lo tanto es una obra digna de tan insigne compositor; tiene trozos sublimes que el público corona de aplausos al terminar tan inspiradas composiciones.

Las decoraciones del 1º y 2º acto son notabilísimas, ya por las atinadas líneas de perspectiva, ya por los diversos matices que ambas envuelven, dando más a conocer los pinceles de sus autores los Sres. Moragas y Alarma. […]

"Gaziel

Poema lírico-dramático en un acto y tres cuadros, de Apeles Mestres, con música de Enrique Granados, estrenado con grandioso éxito en el teatro Principal de Barcelona.

El empresario del teatro Principal, D. Luis Graner, no ceja en su campaña artística, cuyo objetivo es darnos a conocer obras del Teatro lírico catalán, que gracias a sus plausibles iniciativas cuenta con un buen repertorio, contribuyendo así a que conozcamos las grandes dotes artísticas de muchos escritores y músicos que no teniendo donde presentar sus producciones, permanecían los más de ellos casi ignorados.

El público favorece con su asistencia «los espectáculos Graner», premiando con sus aplausos la labor de nuestros autores regionales. El éxito mayor de la temporada ha sido el que ha alcanzado Gaziel, precioso poema del notabilísimo poeta Apeles Mestres, y al que Granados ha puesto una música finamente inspirada y colosalmente instrumentada.

El asunto de la obra, a pesar de no prestarse mucho, ha sido admirablemente desarrollado por el genial Apeles Mestres, que ha dado una nueva prueba de sus delicados sentimientos de poeta soñador y de su talento en la concepción de los versos, que son de lo mejor que ha escrito el autor de Poemas del mar. Años atrás escribió Apeles el hermoso poema Gaziel, y el maestro Granados, completamente enamorado del asunto poético del mismo, se ha inspirado en él para escribir una música pictórica de delicados motivos, que con maestría ha armonizado, resultando un conjunto magistral.

El argumento de la obra redúcese a la protección que dispensa Gaziel a un infeliz poeta que le solicita amor y gloria, concediéndole también la bienhechora hada de la riqueza, ya que con solo el amor y la gloria no es posible la vida. El pobre poeta, que se ve amado y que ha alcanzado la gloria, cree ser feliz, hasta que, despertando de su sueño, se convence de que es difícil lograr el amor, la gloria y la riqueza.

Las situaciones escénicas se prestan excelentemente a la música, que supera al libro, sin embargo de ser este muy bueno, aunque no del todo comprendido por el público. Es la delicadeza, el sentimiento artístico, lo más admirable de la obra, y aunque la forma de que el autor se sirve para comunicar al público estas exquisiteces de su alma es sencilla, no siempre llega al auditorio. Se hace preciso para saborear manjares delicados tener un paladar muy fino, y de este privilegio no disfrutan todos los que forman el público de un teatro, aunque sientan verdadera afición por el género que se les ofrece.

En arte escapan las sutilezas del ingenio tan fácilmente como las manifestaciones de un espíritu delicado a todo el que no tenga algo de artista que le permita adaptarse al medio y compenetrarse con lo que se expone ante sus ojos. Esto no quiere decir que la obra de Apeles Mestres no haya sido comprendida por el público, sino que para muchos espectadores no todas sus bellezas, que son muchas, pudieron ser saboreadas.

Por lo demás, Apeles Mestres ha conquistado un nuevo y brillantísimo triunfo con el estreno de Gaziel, aunque su exagerada modestia, en consonancia con su talento, le lleve a romper con la costumbre de presentarse al público como suelen hacer los autores cuando sus obras son aplaudidas y algunos aun cuando no lo sean.

Apeles Mestres jamás ha salido a escena para recibir los aplausos con que el auditorio ha querido premiar sus méritos y eso que sabe que este público no es el que únicamente va al teatro en busca de un pasatiempo para sus ocios, sino que pertenece a una comunión mucho más elevada intelectualmente, cuya sanción es más difícil de obtener y por consecuencia es más apreciable. Para satisfacer su amor propio de artista, a Apeles Mestres le basta con que aplaudan su obra, en tanto que él permanece escondido en la sombra que proyectan los bastidores del escenario.

La partitura, compuesta de fragmentos ideales, causa dulce arrobamiento, siendo de admirar tanto la inspiración como el justo desarrollo y la maestra instrumentación que descubre el profundo conocimiento que de la técnica tiene Granados. La sinfonía, el dúo de amor y la canción báquica, proporcionaron un merecido triunfo al joven y notable maestro. Moragas y Alarma pintaron dos hermosas decoraciones, y especialmente en la del segundo cuadro, que representa un jardín, obtuvieron fuertes aplausos, por la bella y artística perspectiva que presenta.

El actor Sr. Santpere interpretó acertadamente «el poeta», y el aplaudido barítono Sr. Puiggener cantó como él sabe hacerlo el brindis del segundo cuadro. Las Srtas. Paricio y Viola desempeñaron sus papeles con arte y finura.

En resumen: Granados ha alcanzado un ruidoso éxito con su última producción, que ha sido unánimemente alabada por la prensa barcelonesa.

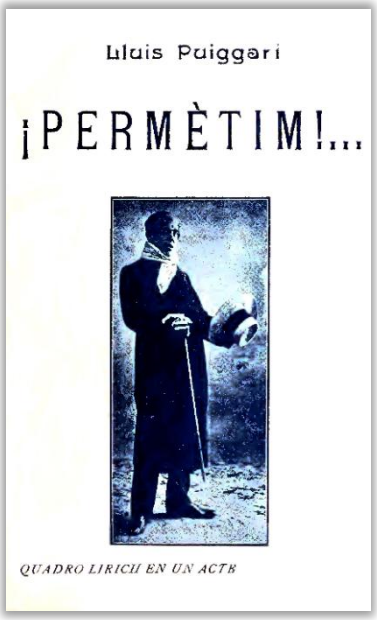
"[…] El segundo éxito de la temporada fue obtenido por Gaziel, de Apeles Mestres y el maestro Granados, hermosísima producción en la que sus autores prodigaron su extraordinario talento.

Gaziel fue, sin duda, la mejor obra estrenada en la última temporada. El libro, es un poema delicado que impresiona dulcemente, y cuyos versos son un primor.

Gaziel es también una fábula: el sueño de un poeta que desea gloria, riqueza y amor, y cuando ha realizado sus ilusiones, cuando ha logrado lo que tanto deseaba y le concede la bienhechora hada, Gaziel,... despierta de su sueño, y se ve tan pobre y miserable como antes, sin gloria, sin amor y sin riqueza.



Enrique Granados, uno de nuestros mejores músicos, escribió una partitura admirable por la inspiración de sus melodías y magnífica instrumentación. La sinfonía, un dúo de amor y un brindis, son los fragmentos más bellos de Gaziel, obra que no todo el público comprendió, por requerir para ello cierto buen gusto e intuición artística, que no poseen todos los que concurren a los teatros. Ressenyes de premsa:

"És una joguina ben ensopegada i que atrau justament per la seva senzillesa. Amb tot i tractar-se d'un arranjament, els personatges tenen ben bé el caràcter de la gent de casa nostra. I se compren que així sigui, per quant no es tracta d'un arranjament fet amb l'exemplar original a la vista, sinó d'una obreta escrita baix la impressió d'una obra vista representar anys enrere per l'arranjador. Per això pot dir-se que a l'obra no li manca més que un gruix de cabell per a que resulti original.

Com que es tracta d'una acció amb sorpresa, ens abstenim de contar-ne els incidents, a fi de no perjudicar als que la vagin a veure.

Amb Permeti'm! va debutar la Morera en un paper de vella repatània que va ser sostingut per l'actriu amb l'aplom de costum. El públic, al sortir l'eminent característica, va saludar-la amb un entusiàstic picament de mans.

També varen ser aplaudits els eixerits nombres musicals amb què ha il·lustrat l'obreta el mestre Esquerrà, que ha fet una música juganera i agradosa de sentir, ben apropiada al caràcter de la peça. El duo que canten en Santpere i la Viola va ser molt celebrat, igual que la mena de glosa humorística que de la Música prohibida canta en Santpere. Aquest actor, en un vell repatani que fa pendant amb el paper de la Morera, va estar també ajustat del tot, com va estar-ho la Viola en un paper de joveneta i especialment en els trossos cantats.

Finalment, cal anomenar en Balot i en Puiggarí, que va estar molt en caràcter en el marit de la vella repatània, home de pasta d'agnus que es deixa dominar per la muller.

Al final, el públic va fer aixecar el teló diferents vegades, demanant els autors i, no presentant-se més que el de la lletra, perquè era l'únic que es trobava a l'escenari feia estona, puig en lloc de ser el G. Pastor que s'anunciava, va resultar el mateix Puiggarí.

"Permeti'm!. Comèdia lírica, en un acte i en prosa, arreglo del francès per Gaietà Pastor, amb música del Mestre Esquerrà.

L'actor d' aquest teatre, Sr. Puiggarí, que rendeix tribut a Talia per partida doble, ha escrit, amagat amb el pseudònim abans dit, una combinació d'escenes còmiques que motiven un argument senzillet, però enginyós i bellugadís. Permeti'm!, no conté xistos que facin esclatar la rialla, empró les agudeses de l'oncle que a cops és més que un pare, i el caràcter feréstec d'una futura sogra, supleixen sobradament a aquells.

La Morera (que al sortir a escena fou saludada amb un aplauso general) simula una d'aquestes mullers varonils que troben per marit un bonhome qui renuncia al govern de la casa perquè veu que se li ha quedat amb les arriendes. La interpretació que en aquest paper va donar la abans dita actriu, fou notabilíssima. La Viola, complí perfectament, tant declamant com cantant. En Santpere, humorístic i oportunista, i en Puiggarí, (padrastre de la criatura,) fent més que un oncle.

La música, agradable; el públic va demanar la repetició d'un duo, a lo que el director d'orquestra no va accedir."

La Escena catalana 5 (03/11/1906), p. 4.

"[...] Permeti'm, estrenat al mateix teatre, no és pròpiament una obra lírica. L'Esquerrà hi ha posat un parell de nombres musicals eixerits i prou. En quant a l'autor de la lletra, no ha tingut més intent que el de produir una peça graciosa, i pot dir-se que n'ha sortit airosament, fent riure en gran manera al públic. En aquesta obra ha debutat la Morera, que hi ha fet una característica com totes les seves: immillorable. En Santpere, en Viola, en Balot i en Puiggarí (que, dit sigui de passada, sembla tenir que veure amb l'autor del llibre), estan també ben justos en els seus papers respectius. [...]"

"També fa riure el passatemps en un acte "Permeti!"... Ai, que no me'n recordo com s'escriu!... Ah, sí, amb un guió darrere la "i" i una "m" darrere el guió. Així: "Permeti'm!" Molt bé!...

Se tracta d'una obreta escrita per l'actor Puiggarí i inspirada en una de francesa que en va veure no sé a on. De manera, que amb una mica més ja no calia dir-ne arranjament. El autor no se propuso, etcètera. I va aconseguir-ho, perquè el públic hi passa una estona de platxèria. L'Esquerrà ha escrit per a Permeti'm! un parell de solfes que escauen d'allò més a l'acció, i la Morera, la Viola, en Santpere, en Puiggarí i en Balot representen l'obra amb acert.

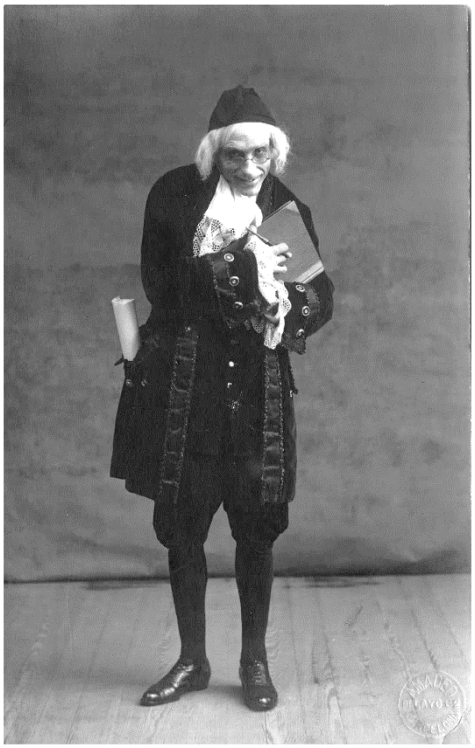
Text: BC: Rull C 4/11-12º; CDMAE: 13221-N.



Música: SGAE: BAR/B-57.

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

"Primer acte:

I episodi: L'engrescament del Comte.

És el palau del Comte. La Paula, criada major, està escalfant-se a la vora del foc i canta: [...]" "Arriba en Genís, criat major, i es mostra tot enfadat perquè la Paula vol casar-se amb el Comte. I fins diu que ell impedirà el casament, d'acord amb la Bruixa vella, a la qui se'n va a trobar, deixant altre cop sola a la Paula, qui torna a cantar, sorprenent-la al cap d'alguns versos l'arribada del Comte."

"Després d'aquest duo, el Comte explica la seva amor a la Paula, i la Paula acaba per accedir a ser la seva dona, però primer el fa bobejar una mica. Aleshores, se'n va cap a la Rectoria per donar ordre de treure els papers. I la Paula, al restar sola, canta:"

Il·lustració 135: Ramon Tor caracteritzat de notari per a Les calderes d'en Pere Botero. [CDMAE Reg. 316619].

“II episodi: L’assemblea de les Bruixes.

És una selva, de nit.”

“Compareixen en Genís i la Bruixa vella. En Genís no les té totes i la Bruixa l’entreté comptant-li la seva història. Després crida l’assemblea i compareixen altres bruixes, amb bruixots, follets i ànimes en pena.”

“La Bruixa vella dona ordre d’acabar la gresca i proposa a l’assemblea embruixar el Comte. Les altres bruixes i els bruixots ho troben bé i la Bruixa vella dona una ampolleta a en Genís, perquè en faci beure el contingut al Comte. Mentre en Genís se’n va, les bruixes i els bruixots reprenen la dansa.”

Il·lustració 136: Maria Morera en el paper de bruixa vella amb l'ampolla per a Genís en Les calderes d’en Pere Botero. [AFB3-117 Reg. 77930]

“III episodi: El pacte amb el Dimoni.

Tornen a ser a casa’l Comte.”

“La Paula taral·leja la cançó amb què ha clos el primer episodi. Arriba el Comte tot enfadat perquè en tot l’arxiu parroquial no es troba l’òbit de la darrera dona. I sense l’òbit no hi ha casament possible. Això el té febrós al Comte. Els polsos li baten, la pell li crema, té una set abrusadora. Per això fa cridar a en Genís perquè li dugui beure. I en Genís obeeix i barreja a la beguda lo que li ha donat la Bruixa vella. I el Comte s’adorm, però quan ho està, salta de sota la taula un follet qui el desperta i li explica que l’òbit és a les calderes d’en Pere Botero, i no té més remei que anar-lo a buscar allà baix en companyia del Dimoni gros, qui contesta a tronades i compareix al cap d’un instant tot calmós... És un dimoni estrany el tal dimoni: tothom el prenia per un dimoni de bé, i això fa que inspiri confiança al Comte, fins al punt de decidir-lo a baixar a l’infern per la línia directa.

I s’acaba l’episodi i s’acaba l’acte, obrint-se la terra i enfonsant-se el Comte i el Dimoni gros, mentre una colla que n’ha sortit de sobte dansen diabòlicament.”

“Segon acte:

I episodi: La baixada a l’infern.

Una sala de l’infern amb unes rengles de calderes per fer bullir els condemnats.”

“Com que el Dimoni gros encara no ha tornat, en Pere Botero, el Cua-llarg i en Banyeta es disputen en un tercet la gerència de l’infern.”

“Arriba el Dimoni prim i diu als altres que no es disputin perquè ha sentit el primer tro anunciant la tornada del Dimoni gros. Aquest, acompanyat del Comte, baixa de la Terra al cap d’uns instants mentre tots els dimonis canten:”

“El Dimoni gros es queixa de lo abandonat que han deixat el foc durant la seva absència i dona ordre d’avivar les flames. Tothom va a ocupar el lloc que li correspon i, en un moment que resten sols el Comte i el Dimoni prim, se troben coneguts de la Terra i, aleshores, el Dimoni prim explica al Comte que a l’infern hi té les seves sis dones i les seves sis sogres. Justament les sogres són a dintre les calderes d’allà a prop. Lo de les sogres ja ho creu el Comte, però lo de les dones no, per lo qual el dimoni prim va a buscar-les. Aleshores, les sogres treuen el cap i les urpes per sobre les calderes i canten:”

“Torna el Dimoni prim i després de fer ficar a les calderes les sogres, diu al Comte que aviat veurà la seva primera dona. Aleshores, el Comte s’adona d’altres condemnats que havia conegut a la Terra, i després d’una escena amb ells compareix la primera dona, que es diu Bruniquilda. Però al cap de poc venen les altres i mouen un gran enrenou per voler ser totes les preferides del Comte. Això fa que armin una batalla a la qual posa fi el Dimoni prim, fent-les fora totes menys la Bruniquilda, qui recrimina al Comte per haver-se casat tants cops i per voler-hi tornar encara, cosa que li desaconsella. I fins l’en fa desistir, fent-li veure per una escletxa de l’infern lo que passa en aquells moments a casa seva, on els criats i criades aprofiten la seva absència per divertir-se. A més, l’avisa que el Dimoni gros no és pas tan bon jan com sembla i que tot allò del casament i la baixada a l’infern no és altra cosa que un llaç. Però arriba el Dimoni gros i comença la festa aprofitant el Comte l’animació per fugir de l’infern, guiat per la Bruniquilda.”

“II episodi: La tornada a la Terra.

A ca el Comte.”

“Els criats i les criades beuen i canten a l’entorn d’una taula:”

“Criats i criades mouen molta gresca, però quan hi són al bo, se’ls aixeca el Comte del bell mig de la taula. Tots cauen humiliats demanant-li perdó i això el desarma. Veus-aquí perquè, recordant un consell que li ha donat la Bruniquilda de fer de pare als qui no en tenen, els proposa com a càstig el de casar-se tots al cap de tres setmanes.”

“I criats i criades s’aparellen i s’acaba l’obra entre gran animació.”

"És una obra d'espectacle que requereix per a ser posada en escena un gran compte en tots els elements auxiliars de què necessita per a que produeixin en l'espectacle l'efecte que s'havia proposat l'autor.

Com que les opinions entre el públic foren encontrades, a l'objecte de que el companyerisme que ens lliga amb l'autor de la lletra no ens fes ser parcials, transcrivim a continuació lo que de la nit de l'estrena en diu el distingit crític de La Vanguardia. Parlant del conjunt de l'obra diu, després de parlar de la presentació que l'obra requeria:

> "Faltó en esto su pizca de fantasía para completar la ilusión. Y de ahí cierto desequilibrio que se advirtió, del cual está muy lejos de tener arte ni parte el autor.
> Lo comprueba que cuanto toca a escenas en que la presentación debía ser el todo, fueran acogidas con reserva; y en cambio aplaudidas aquellas otras que, como el tercer cuadro y parte del siguiente, la letra se sobrepone a lo restante.
>
> La música peca de carencia de claroscuro y de variedad en los motivos. En cuanto a la decoración del señor Ros i Güell, representativa de los antros infernales, es de coloración intensa.
> El público se divirtió al juzgar la obra."

"[...] De Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, estrenades al Principal, no em veig amb cor de dir-ne res. Que ho faci un altre si vol. Jo plego per avui.

Virolet[46]

[46] Virolet era el pseudònim de Josep Morató, autor de la lletra de l'obra, que normalment deixava que un altre crític fes la ressenya de les obres de la seva autoria.

"Aquest altre és un servidor de vostès, que des d'una butaca de la fila 3ª vaig assistir a l'estrena de l'obra, lo que equival a dir que la vaig veure d'a prop i a mayor abundamiento amb els camelos de la dona i, per lo tant, me trobava en situació de reparar lo que no van veure els altres espectadors més llunyans o sense ulls complementaris.

I lo que vaig veure va ser que per part de tothom semblava haver-hi empenyo en rebentar aquelles calderes que, si bé l'autor no va tenir la pretensió que fossin de cavalls de força, en canvi la tinguessin molts barcos de guerra que jo em sé, que no es veurien en la necessitat de desfer rutes.

En primer lloc, contem-hi a l'empresa que si es cert que va mostrar-se esplèndida en el primer quadro del segon acte, confiant en el senyor Ros i Güell una decoració d'infern de deixa'm encendre, en canvi va ser massa escassa en la presentació per lo que es refereix als demés quadros, en especial en aquell que l'assemblea de mals esperits tinguda en lloc apacible i frescal més propi per a fer-hi costellades que no pas per a celebrar-hi aquelarres, acabant de completar l'efecte aquells bruixots, bruixes i ànimes en pena trets a col·lació en el mateix quadro, que ens feien més la impressió d'alegre comparsa de dimarts de Carnestoltes que no de subjectes que tenen per obligació espantar als infeliços mortals i fer desvariar a les criatures.

—¿No deyen que eren den Morató aquestes calderes?
—Si.
—Com que aqui veig que son den Pere Botero. .

En les representacions successives diu que s'hi ha adobat quelcom, amb additament de llamps i tronades que esgarrifen. Més val així...

Cal fer justícia als actors que treballaren tots a consciència, per més que alguns d'ells en qualitat de dimonis no tenien obligació de tenir-ne.

En quant a la música, és ben apropiada a la situació: infernal... en el mal sentit de la paraula.

"No havent pogut assistir a l'estrena de Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, el revister pensava fer-los en dos quartos transmetent les noves per referències. A l'efecte, agafo un diari del diumenge i em trobo amb lo següent:

> "El senyor Morató ha sabut combinar una acció summament entretinguda*, que ha salpicado de graciosos chistes*. La música del mestre Esquerrà és com correspon al assumpte."

Prenc un altre diari i m'adono d'aquest text:

> "No creiem que Les calderes s'aguantin en els cartells. El diàleg no té res de graciós. La música és mediocre i no té relleu."

M'he quedat, doncs, com abans i deixo de parlar-ne fins que ho vegi amb mos propis ulls i ho senti amb mes pròpies orelles... si és que tornen a fer l'obra d'avui a la setmana entrant, i si no la fan més, ja no caldrà parlar-ne... Senyal que haurà anat a les calderes d'en Pere Botero."

La Esquella de la Torratxa 1456 (23/11/1906), p. 779.

"Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, farsa en dos episodis i sis quadros, llibre de Josep Morató i Grau, amb música del Mestre Esquerrà i decorat de Ros i Güell.

Valent-se de bruixes, dimonis, sogres... i de la influencia que té amb l'empresa, el conegut crític teatral de La Veu i Cu-cut! ha combinat unes quantes escenes, reproducció d'infinitat d'obres mes o menys conegudes; amb llenguatge casolà i algunes Staramsadas entreté l'auditori, fent riure en algunes ocasions i fent plorar a mitja dotzena de sogres que cremen dins les calderes infernals... allò fa escruixir!

Amb la confiança de que l'actor Santpere abusarà del seu ingeni, afegint en cada representació xistes dels seus, creiem que l'obra pot anar passant... i adorant. La música, fora d'un preludi de les Walkiries, va semblar-nos feta del mateix autor de la lletra. Del decorat sols destaca una biga infernal.

L'execució sigué acceptable. La Morera, la Paricio i la Cazorla, interpretaren amb justesa. En Santpere, en Puiggarí, en Morató i en García, notables. El cor de dimonis i dimoniesses... infernal. La clack, a gran altura. Esperem que el Sr. Morató prendrà la revenja en Las angúnies del repòs."

"El fracàs de Les calderes ha obligat a l'empresa a aferrar-se de nou a les darreres obres estrenades, alternant una mica amb aquella i a adelantar l'estreno de Pierrot lladre, lletra d'Apel·les Mestres, música del Mtre. Sadurní, amb decorat nou d'en Castells, que si a Déu plau tindrà lloc avui."

"Al Principal s'ha estrenat amb èxit contradictori, —més aviat dolent— la farsa Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, amb lletra d'en Morató, música de l'Esquerrà i un parell de decoracions noves d'en Ros i Güell. En descàrrec de l'autor de la lletra puc dir que, fora el treball meritori dels actors, no va haver-hi en la representació gairebé cap de les coses que havien d'ajudar al llibre, mancant-n'hi per curtetat de temps, fins algunes de les que estaven marcades d'una manera precisa en les acotacions. Està clar que d'això el públic no n'havia de fer res, però jo que sé les interioritats de la cosa —massa i tot! — crec que un autor també pot tenir el dret de defensa. Amb lo qual no intento carregar el mort a ningú, sinó fer constar que el públic no va veure tot lo que hi ha al llibre, escrit amb l'intent de fer una obra d'espectacle, amb recursos escènics dels quals no es va fer us, i amb música apropiada i nova.

Del treball d'en Ros i Güell com escenògraf, pot alabar-se'n amb justícia la decoració que representa l'infern i que resulta realment una cosa encesa i brillant. Els actors, com ja he indicat, complexen tots amb la seva obligació. [...]

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Anoche se dio en el teatro Principal una función en honor del poeta Apeles Mestres y del maestro Morera, representándose por centésima vez La Nit de Reis, original de los citados artistas.

Se estrenó Pierrot lladre, de Apeles y del maestro Sadurní. La obra fue aplaudida, repitiéndose un dúo a instancias del público. El libretista hace gala de su ingenio y el músico de sus buenas condiciones de composición."

La Publicidad 10024 (25/11/1906), p. 5.

"Per a commemorar la centena representació de Nit de Reis va conjuminar-se una funció especial en honor dels seus autors, combinada amb l'estrena de dues obres de l'autor de la lletra: Pierrot lladre, amb música d'en Sadurní, i el monòleg El malalt.

[...] I a darrera del monòleg va venir l'estrena de Pierrot lladre, obreta satírica plena de segones intencions i escrita amb molta traça... Amb tot i pertànyer l'obra al gènere bufonesc, resulta d'una finor extraordinària, gràcies a l'abundor de mitges tintes i a l'art amb què l'autor sap vestir els conceptes. I ademés és pintoresc el Pierrot lladre. Recrea l'esperit i fa bé als ulls... És una caricatura d'escriptor o una comèdia de caricaturista. Com vulgueu.

En Santpere fa amb un agredolç de molt bon gust el paper de Pierrot; la Paricio, en la Colombina, està ben ajustada al paper; en Garcia, per la seva banda, fa un bandoler ple de caràcter; en Puiggarí interpreta amb l'encert de costum un paper de comerciant ric esdevingut miserable; en Vinyals un d'inventor molt ben entès, i en Tor, un cap de ronda que ve a ser lo que en llenguatge de teatre se'n diu un embolat.

Tots aquests personatges van abillats pintorescament i es veuen el diàleg realçat a trossos per una música ben adequada a la lletra...

És una música lleugera i seriosa a la vegada que ara us fa somriure i ara us encanta, ara us alegra i ara us emociona. El duo entre el Pierrot i la Colombina és en aquest concepte realment inspirat. En canvi, dintre el caient humorístic, són ben eixerits el duo entre el mateix Pierrot i l'inventor i el cor de la ronda d'agutzils.

La decoració que ha pintat per a Pierrot lladre el senyor Castells és d'un gran efecte i fa molta il·lusió, sobre tot a l'últim terme, en què es veu la vista de Barcelona des del Tibidabo."

La Veu de Catalunya 2736 (26/11/1906), ed. matí, p. 2.

"[...] També fa riure una mena de sàtira titulada Pierrot lladre, estrenada al Principal i de la que en són autors l'Apel·les Mestres i el mestre Sadurní. Però això del Pierrot ja té més... pretensions. I la prova és que tot rient rient s'hi diu mal d'una pila de coses i s'hi tracta de lladre a una pila de gent... gairebé a tothom fora al Pierrot... En Garcia fa de Pierrot, en Puiggarí fa de lladre, en Vinyals fa de lladre, la Paricio fa de lladre... del cor del Pierrot. I l'únic que no sap fer de lladre és el Pierrot mateix, o sigui, en Santpere, que, després de fer el determini d'exercir semblant ofici, es veu en la impossibilitat de fer-hi res de bo perquè es troba amb que totes les persones a les que demana la bossa són més lladres que ell, com ho demostra el fet que no n'hi ha cap que no li robi una cosa o altra.

Tot l'enrenou armat per l'Apel·les Mestres ha estat engalonat amb alguns trossos de música del mestre Sadurní, que s'ha sapigut empapar de l'ambient humorístic de l'obra.

I veus-aquí que amb l'estrena del Pierrot lladre i d'un monòleg del mateix Apel·les força fluixet però interpretat amb justesa per en Puiggarí, va celebrar-se la centena representació de Nit de Reis. [...]

"Crónicas menudas

Apeles Mestres me fuerza tiránicamente, con dulce tiranía, a darle un «bombito» cada quince días. ¿Y cómo yo, que no gusto de nada, según propalan por ahí mis inefables enemigos, encuentro bueno lo que hace este poeta-pintor a quien no conozco más que para servirle, de quien, por tanto, no soy amigo, que vive retirado, sin cultivar el incienso de la letra de molde, y de quien no se sabe que comulgue en ningún cenáculo murmurador? Este misterio, que no es tal, tiene diáfana explicación. Creo, con un tanto de vanidad, que hay semejanzas entre el espíritu de Apeles Mestres y el mío; ambos consideramos la vida al modo de una comedia con muchedumbre de personajes que la representan, unos bien, otros mal, según sean mejores o peores cómicos, pero pensando que son cómicos y no otra cosa. Solo en juzgar así podemos parecernos, naturalmente, y no en el procedimiento para exteriorizar el común modo de pensar, que es en Mestres humorismo tocado de cierta delicadeza de expresión y en mí ironía ásperamente desenvuelta.

Ahí está para probarlo ese delicioso Pierrot lladre, estrenado en el Principal, y que bien pudiera ser una autobiografía. Pierrot, el Pierrot de Mestres, es el cándido de espíritu, el «alma blanca» de las leyendas rusas que pasa por el mundo sin enterarse de lo que nos hemos enterado Mestres y yo: de que todo esto es «comedia para llorar y tragedia para reír» y de que lo peor que puede suceder al hombre es tomar al Hombre en serio. El Pierrot de Mestres incurre en esta visión falsa de las cosas, se hace un poco escéptico, muy poco, lo necesario para sospechar que puede ser negocio convertirse en malo, y malo procura hacerse metiéndose a ladrón de encrucijada. ¡Pierrot ladrón! Era una idea que estaba a disposición de todo el que hubiese querido recogerla. Apeles se ha bajado y la ha recogido, engarzándola con el primor de un orfebre florentino entre repujados retóricos.

Pero Pierrot ha sido vanidoso, creyendo que la paloma deja de serlo cubriéndose con pluma de gavilán y poniéndose pico corvo y agudo. Como el primer viandante a quien asalta no sueña como él, le deja sin pañuelo, y el segundo sin la única peseta que posee. ¿Qué le queda al pobre aventurero del Ideal? Lo que no pueden quitarle los hombres, pero sí las mujeres: el corazón. Colombina, culpable y arrepentida, se lo lleva. Pierrot no sirve para ladrón, no ha nacido para gavilán, porque para serlo se viene a la vida armado con pico y garras, y vuelve a la ciudad descorazonado de sí mismo, como antes fue al monte descorazonado de los demás. De esta falta de fe en la bondad del Hombre está hondamente tocado el poeta de Gaziel, y de ello deja indelebles señales Apeles Mestres en el diálogo de Pierrot lladre, gracioso superficialmente, amargo y hasta duro a poco que se bucee en él, pero, ¡ay!, tristemente verdadero.

Me ha parecido esta obra superior a Gaziel como «maquinaria teatral» y, sobre todo, como tendencia y demostración. Justo es confesar que a parecerlo ha contribuido la música de Sadurní, en extremo bien hecha en la orquesta y un tanto despectiva para las voces. Y aquellos cómicos del Principal hicieron bien los personajes con «segunda intención» de Pierrot lladre, a pesar de que todos creíamos que solo se desenvolvían bien en las castas figuras de retablo que hasta aquí han venido haciendo A. M. D. G. ¡Quién sabe! Tal vez Santpere, García, Tor, Puiggarí y Vinyals y la señorita Paricio confesaron y comulgaron por la mañana. Si así fue, ¡caramba!, no es raro que en tan santas disposiciones sirvieran el Pierrot lladre como el propio autor hubiese deseado.

Si el escenógrafo Castells hubiera siquiera oído misa, una sencilla misa rezada, habríale salido completa la decoración, que me pareció bien excepto en las rocas de la gruta, con exceso rojas. Para cuando pinte otra decoración el señor Castells pruebe con una misa mayor, a ver lo que le sale luego. […]

"L'afortunat autor de Nit de Reis se n'ha apuntat una altra al seu favor. El país de vano estrenat darrerament és tot un poema d'ensenyances. Rient rient, jugant jugant l'Apel·les Mestres canta les veritats des de les taules per boca d'en Pierrot lladre. El motiu és senzill, delicat: un pobre Pierrot que, desenganyat, es dedica a lladre i no hi entén pilota... resultant que el robat és ell, doncs li prenen tot, fins el cor. Això, aquest petit argument li serveix a l'autor per a esplaiar-se en consideracions originalíssimes i per a fer gala de ses excel·lents condicions de poeta.

El llenguatge, com de costum, exquisit. La gràcia a cabassos. Acompanyen al llibre alguns números musicals deguts a l'expert mestre Sadurní, sobresortint entre ells una ronda i el duo de Colombina i Pierrot. El públic aclamà als autors amb verdader entusiasme."

"De verdadera solemnitat devem calificar la funció donada el darrer dissabte en honor dels autors de Nit de Reis amb motiu de la centèsima representació de aquesta celebrada obreta.

El teatre estava ple de gom a gom per un públic frisós, per tributar un aplauso a la inspiració del poeta i al talent del músic. Començà la representació amb Nit de Reis, desempenyada per tot el personal amb gran justesa, i seguidament el Sr. Puiggarí recita el monòleg d'Apel·les Mestres El malalt, publicat en una col·lecció i que no creiem que s'hagués representat anteriorment, imprimint de l'actor en la obreta molta gràcia i naturalitat, que el públic premià amb sos aplausos.

Per fi va estrenar-se Pierrot lladre, país de vano, lletra d'Apel·les Mestres, música del Mtre. Sadurní. Es tracta de una sàtira finíssima, d'un argument especial i que tot plegat potser no és prou teatral, però impressiona i conté tocs inspiradíssims.

Pierrot, desenganyat de ser home de bé, es llança a robar en camí ral, però faltat de condicions resulta sempre ser ell el robat i quan ja no li queda res, se presenta Colombina i li roba el cor, demostrant que aquell que ha nascut pel bé, mai pot fer el mal.

L'obra està escrita amb un humorisme molt delicat, abundant les frases intencionades i els xistos ben trobats.

L'execució que es dona a aquesta producció és immillorable. En Santpere fa un Pierrot molt deliciós, la Paricio una encantadora Colombina, i Garcia, en Puiggarí i en Vinyals, estan molt justos en sos papers.

La decoració d'en Castells representant Barcelona des de el Tibidabo és d'efecte i fa il·lusió. I la música del Mtre. Sadurní és molt seriosa i apropiada."

La Escena catalana 9 (01/12/1906), p. 3.

"Pierrot lladre: aquest és el títol de l'obreta, que també és joia dels ulls, com la Nit de Reis, però que no té les condicions d'aquesta per a entrar en el públic. Nit de Reis és una cosa espontània, senzilla, bonatxona; Pierrot lladre és un pas de comèdia treballat, amb aires de sàtira maligna...

Aires només, perquè no arriba a ferir mai amb prou fermesa per a produir butllofa... Lo que arriba més al públic és lo que té de francament còmic i pintoresc. Això, que ve a ser l'amaniment de la sàtira, pren aspectes de ser lo principal, mentre que la sàtira es converteix per al públic en amaniment. [...]

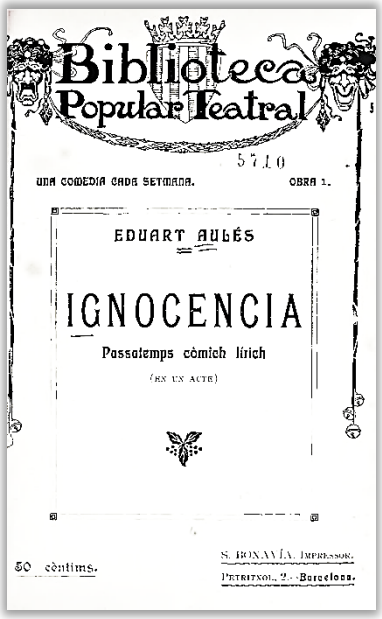
"Apeles Mestres nos ha dado a conocer otra obra, como todas las suyas inspiradísima y dulcemente poética. Las amargas desventuras de Pierrot, que entra a formar parte de una cuadrilla de malhechores, y en la que tras de luchar y exponer su vida y libertad se ve engañado y robado de sus compañeros, que no contentos con ello róbanle el amor de Colombina, es el argumento de la obra lírica de Apeles Mestres, titulada Pierrot lladre.

El maestro Sadurní ha compuesto una partitura hermosísima y que está perfectamente instrumentada. En el teatro Principal, donde se ha estrenado la nueva obra del gran poeta catalán, se estrenaron Ignocència, de Aulés y maestro Grant, y Les calderes d'en Pere Botero, de Morató y Esquerrà."

El arte del teatro 18 (15/12/1906), p. 17.

"[…] Otras obras se estrenaron en el teatro Principal, que, sin resultar grandes éxitos, no dejaron de ser bien acogidas por el público. Entre ellas, debemos mencionar las siguientes: Pierrot lladre, de Apeles Mestres y el maestro Sadurní; La nina dormida al bosc, de Montoliu y el maestro Alfonso, y otras que no agradaron tanto como las citadas.

Pierrot lladre está admirablemente escrita, y el argumento es por demás agradable. Pierrot huye de la ciudad y va al monte para hacerse salteador de caminos. Quiere unirse con un célebre bandido, quien antes de admitirle en su compañía, desea conocer sus méritos (?). El infeliz Pierrot se deja engañar por todos cuantos caen en sus manos y a los que pretende desbalijar; incluso Colombina, que le engaña de nuevo, y así, ve robado todo lo que tenía: dinero, prendas y amor.



El maestro Sadurní ha escrito para esta producción una bonita y agradable música, que fue muy aplaudida. De los actores intérpretes de las obras que hemos ligeramente bosquejado, poco podemos decir, ya que casi todos ellos son medianías, si exceptuamos a la Srta. Morató, Sra. Morera y el barítono Puiggener; de los demás, Puiggarí, Santpere, Morató, Tor, etc., etc., creemos sinceramente que no estuvieron a la altura de su cometido. […]

Per cert que vaig esverar-me el dia de la estrena. Quan vaig veure aquella menuda tan eixerida fent un paper de tant compromís, cantant cuplets i ballant el cake-walk, vaig pensar: «Ay Graner que descarriles». I es veu que en Graner mateix se n'ha adonat i en les representacions successives ho ha adobat un xic. Del mal... el menos.

"Innocència. — Sarsuela en un acte, lletra d'Eduard Aulés i música del Mestre Grant.

EDUART AULÉS
Autor de INNOCENCIA

Una obreta que respira gràcia per tots costats. S'hi descobreix la inspiració d'autor francès, per lo que el nostre Aulés la anomena «arreglo», però és un «arreglo» amb tota forma, no una traducció com desgraciadament escriuen alguns autors catalans poc escrupolosos.

Innocència és una nena, filla de casa rica i noble, que amb sa vivor ingènua destorba totes les tramoies que es porten dos criats de la casa, motivant això escenes interesants i de gran efecte teatral i empedrades de frases xistoses.

La Morera fa molt bé una senyora Baronessa, que potser és l'únic tipo de l'obra que no resulta al ser trasplantat en català.
En Santpere amb sa serietat còmica interpreta un lacayo ingeniosíssim i diu els xistos amb naturalitat oportuna. La Paricio i en Tor, bé.

La nena Vendrell, és una actriu en miniatura... En diríem quelcom mes, però no som amants de que las criatures treballin pel teatre, en cap sentit. El paper que representa aquesta nena (que és una precocitat) podria molt bé desempenyar-lo una dameta jove, produint molt més efecte teatral i privant de que aquella nena retiri a la una de la nit, després d'un treball superior a ses forces.

Tornant á la obra, fem constar que sigué un èxit que es repeteix cada nit. No es pot esperar menos d'un autor tan acreditat com ho és qui escrigué el Cel Rogent, Cap i cua, Lo Sant Cristo gros i moltes altres produccions que han enriquit nostra Escena."

La Escena catalana 10 (08/12/1906), p. 3.

"[...] l'Aulés ha estrenat al Principal, amb música d'en Grant, una peça arranjada del francès —repertori Labiche— amb el títol de Innocència.

Una calaverada d'uns criats de casa bona, descoberts per la falugueta de la casa, (una nena que es diu Innocència), és lo que serveix de tema a n'aquesta obra, qual atractiu principal consisteix en lo que deuria desagradar més al públic, o sigui en el treball de la nena Vendrell, encarregada del paper de protagonista, en el que hi fa una pila-pila de monades y saltirons.

Per lo demés, ja té certa gràcia l'obra. I en Santpere, que fa el criat, ajuda a animar-la, secundat degudament per la Paricio, que fa la criada, i per la Morera i en Tor, que tenen al seu càrrec els altres papers. El públic s'hi diverteix molt... Potser massa. [...]

Ademés va representar-se una òpera modernista parenta de I comini tronati[49], que va fer riure molt al respectable i bondadós, cosa que es pot afirmar també de cert incident promogut entre un espectador del tercer pis anomenat García, un de les butaques anomenat Vinyals i un acomodador que es diu Morató; amb motiu d'haver anunciat en Santpere la reforma del

Per fortuna, tots els que varen intervenir en l'incident varen calmar-se, gràcies a un cataplasma de rialles i aplaudiments que els va posar el públic."

"La funció d'innocents en aquest teatre va consistir en reformar grotescament l'obra Nit de Reis i representar una òpera bufonesca [Una òpera modernista], que feu riure de debò al públic.

En els dies successius s'ha reproduït aquesta funció, alternant amb La rambla de les flors, Innocència i altres del repertori."

La Escena catalana 14 (05/01/1907), p. 4.

"Després de les funcions organitzades amb motiu d'inaugurar-se el monument d'en Pitarra, ben poca cosa s'ha fet de seriós. L'únic que ha torbat la monotonia del repertori conegut, han estat les innocentades.

La del Principal ha consistit en la introducció d'una pila de canvis incidentals en la Nit de Reis; la representació, amb el títol Una òpera modernista d'un arranjament basat en I comici tronati, i en una bromada feta per alguns actors que varen barrejar-se amb el públic, simulant un incident sorollós i simulant-lo amb tanta traça que una bona part de la concurrència no es va adonar de l'engany fins que va ser celebrat per la majoria amb una salva d'aplaudiments i un cor de rialles. Escena I

Gueridó, que compareix al cap d'una estona corprès pel misteri de la soledat."

"Toquen les dotze de la nit molt acompassades i lluny. A la primera batallada s'ha sentit un xiscle i després se'n van sentint d'altres."

Després s'asseuen a terra fent rodona. En Babarotes té a una banda la Vespa i a l'altra a Cigonya."

El llibret editat no separa aquest quadre de l’anterior, per tant, l’acte 1 tindria només 2 quadres segons el text. Per les fotografies podem veure que en algun moment en el transcurs del quadre canvia l’escenografia perquè aparegui el vaixell en què marxen els bruixots i bruixes amb en Gueridó.

“Babarotes ja és al timó.” [Gueridó] “Ell se resisteix.” “Ja són a bordo.” “Ràpidament transformen los estrenyinadors en pals de barco penjant-hi les capes negres que faran de veles. Algunes bruixes, assegudes a les dues bandes del barco, faran de remaires amb les escombres. Canten mentre s’acaben de posar cada bruixot i bruixa al seu lloc.” “La barca es posa en marxa il·luminada per la lluna, remant les bruixes i cantant ells i elles.” “Teló.”

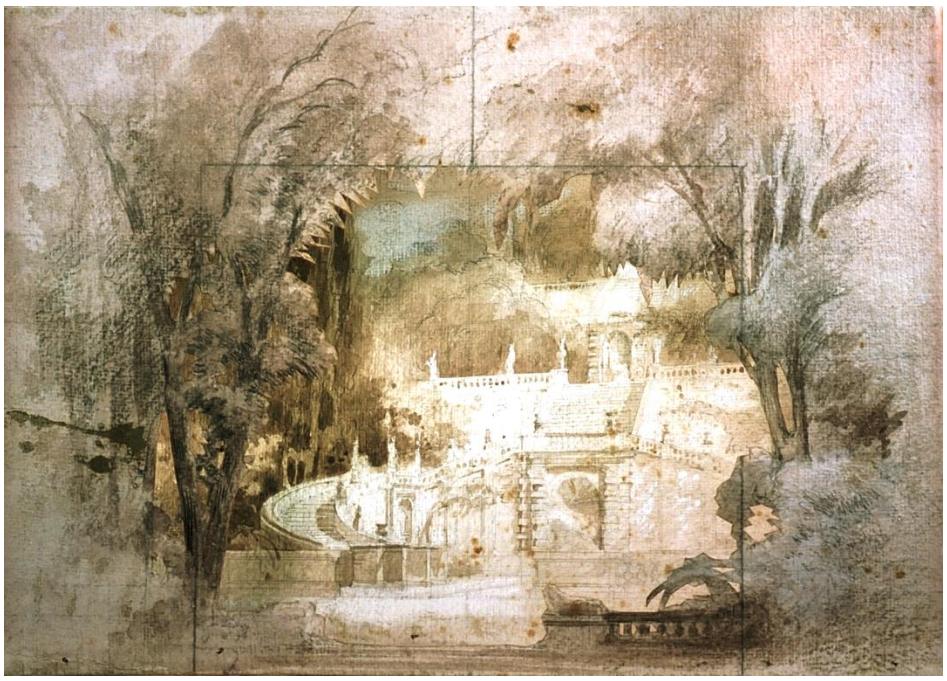
"Se veu la barca que sobre d'una ona gegantina ha aparegut més alta que la muralla. [Magnats] "Pugen a Gueridó en una mena de llitera o palanquí i se l'emporten voltant-lo i amb les espases desenvainades."



"En Gueridó saluda amb la mà ridículament a dreta i esquerra. La cobla abracandària toca una marxa triomfal. Mentre s'allunyen los magnats, les bruixes i els bruixots tornen a prendre sos vells ropatges o, corrent apilotats i rient, desapareixen per altre costat de l'escena. "Los magnats han sortit per l'esquerra; les dones i els corsaris per la dreta."

"Escena VIII

Maria i Gueridó." "Aturant-la a l'acte que va a sortir la darrera." [Maria] "A les donzelles que ja són fora." [Gueridó] "Tot desfent-se'l de la cintura [el ram de flors de la Maria]." "Entregant-li." [Maria] "Sense entendre-ho." "Obrint-lo." "Besant-ho molts cops." "Mirant-se'l i remirant-se'l." [Gueridó] "S'aparta d'ella, s'hi gira mig d'esquena i, posant-se la mà a la boca, la crida." "Rialla." "Cridant també." "Gueridó, alegre acostant-s'hi." "Rient i obrint-li els braços." "Maria, rient també." "S'hi acosta. En ser-hi a prop, se'l mira de cap a peus i s'aparta." "Abaixant els ulls amb tristesa." "Ella va a dir que no [a casar-se amb ell]."

"Escena IX

Maria, Gueridó, Rosa Vera i després magnats, cavallers i dones catalanes."

"L'escena s'omple de cavallers i dames de la Cort. També venen les donzelles catalanes, que es trobaran sempre plegades. Los cortesans canten dues vegades los versos que segueixen, davant d'en Gueridó, fent-li acatament."

"La Maria quan han entrat les donzelles catalanes ha anat cap a elles, i mentre los cavallers i dames han repetit cantant los quatre versos anteriors, elles canten lo següent, barrejant-se els dos cors: [...]." "En Gueridó corre a treure la Maria d'en mig de les noies catalanes i se l'emporta per la mà, resistint-s'hi ella. La gentada de tota mena els volta i surt tothom, barrejats confosament, cantant." "Canvi de decoració."

“Quadro segon

Cambra nupcial a manera de gran hivernacle. Per tot, fins a mig aire, tapissos brodats d’or amb figures fantàstiques, que remouran la cara quan s’indiqui i es transformaran per últim en bruixes i bruixots en desfer-se els tapissos a trossos. De mig aire en amunt, l’hivernacle serà de crestall, veient-se per ses parets i voltes espurnejar les estrelles. Al centre, llit reial dalt de grades. Per damunt del llit, ample cobrecil, quins extrems estan lligats a les soques d’altes palmeres, que el voltaran i que vindran a transformar-se, a son temps, en el príncep Arnolt i els altres cavallers encantats de l’Illa Solitària. En diferents llocs de la cambra hi haurà grans gerros amb plantes estranyes que s’hauran de tornar bruixes i bruixots.”

“La palmera es remou.” “S’ha començat a sentir lo batallar de grosses campanes i les canonades del castell anunciant la sortida dels reis del temple.” “Rosa Vera va a obrir la porta reial de bat a bat. Les palmeres, que s’havien somogut a les primeres campanades, han tornat al repòs a les darreres paraules de Rosa Vera. Va entrant la comitiva de les esposalles, que és llarga i ostentosa. Avança als acords de la marxa nupcial i dels cants de joia.”

“Escena III

Maria, Rosa Vera i Gueridó. La Maria segueix plorant sempre. Rosa Vera està creuada de braços, tenint darrera seu la palmera, que és el príncep Arnolt encantat.” [Maria] “Plorant més fort.” “Abraçant-se amb Rosa Vera.” “Abraçant-se més fort a Rosa Vera.” “Presentant-li el reliquiari.” “S’acosta per jurar-ho. En aquest moment les palmeres, somoguent-se, baten les unes contra les altres, i se senten vagament un xiscle i una rialla de les bruixes i bruixots, que llengotegen i roden els ulls en les figures dels tapissos.” “Maria, perquè en Gueridó no jura.” “Gueridó, volguent-se imposar.”

“La Maria dona un pas cap a en Gueridó.” “Apartant-se més de la Maria.” [Maria] “Obrint-li els braços.” [Gueridó] “Sense anar-hi.” “Maria, anant-hi ella.” “Agafant-se a ell.” [Gueridó] “No se’l deixa fer [el petó]. Rialles i xiscles de les bruixes i balanceig de les palmeres. En Gueridó s’ha després de la Maria i s’aparta.” [Maria] “Caient com morta als braços de Rosa Vera.”

“Gueridó, que ha corregut cap a la Maria.” “Ja l’estava anomenant mentre parlava Rosa Vera.” “En aquest moment comencen a tocar les dotze.” “Desesperat, l’ha presa en sos braços.” “En aquest moment esclata la música, que durà fins que caigui el teló. Xiscles esgarrifosos de les bruixes i bruixots. S’esqueixen els tapissos i es parteixen els gerros, donant sortida a les bruixes i als bruixots que fugen apilotats. Les palmeres desapareixen, convertint-se en el príncep Arnolt i els seus cavallers.”

[Rosa Vera] “Corrent a trobar-lo.” “Arnolt, corrent-hi també.” “L’hivernacle s’ha fet a trossos i, al lluny, entre núvols blanquíssims, que resplendeixen com l’argent i que van davallant, se descobreixen les muntanyes de Montserrat, totes enrogides per la claror de la matinada, tenint als peus una mar de verdor d’esmaragdes. En Gueridó i la Maria, amb sos ropatges primitius, agafats de la mà, criden en veure-les.”

"Queden en escena abraçats el veritable príncep Arnolt i Rosa Vera, amb el mateix vestit de marinera del segon acte. Els guerrers de l'Illa Solitària els volten amb les espases altes. En Gueridó i la Maria s'allunyen en mig de les donzelles catalanes, que ballen, tot caminant, una sardana amb crits d'alegria. Se sent, molt al lluny, tritllejar alegre de campanes. Són d'ermitans de Catalunya tocant a festa. Per entre mig de les punxes de Montserrat va pujant el sol. I se sent cantar per tot."

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Vint[53] decoracions expresses s'han pintat per posar en escena al teatre Principal l'última producció de l'eminent Guimerà. Se titula La sagrada espina, i és una comèdia de gran màgica, en quatre actes, que perteneix de ple al gènere còmic. Els cartells de la [c]asa anuncien que ja està en assaig. L'estrena és esperada amb ànsia."

La Escena catalana 3 (20/10/1906), p. 6.

"S'està assajant en el teatre Romea de Barcelona i potser la setmana entrant es posi ja en cartellera, l'obra titulada El mestre, d'en Pompeu Crehuet amb música del mestre Morera. El propi compositor acaba de posar música a una producció de l'eminent dramaturg D. Àngel Guimerà titulada La santa espina, que dintre poc s'estrenarà en el teatre Principal de la pròpia ciutat.

Pels fragments que en coneixem, podem assegurar que aquesta darrera obra és una verdadera joia literari-musical, com ho resulta també la primera, segons afirmacions de persones que han disfrutat de les primícies de la mateixa."

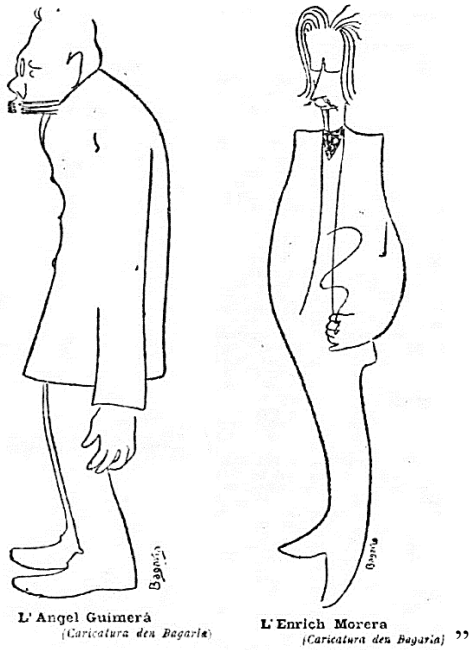
"Després de l'estrena de La santa espina, un nou règim regularà les funcions del Principal.

Totes les sessions de tarda seran senzilles, és a dir, compostes d'una obra lírica en un acte i unes vistes cinematogràfiques.

Les de nit seran triples, posant-se diàriament en escena La santa espina, màgica de gran espectacle, 6 quadros i 8 mutacions d'escena.

Ademés, per a major confort del concurrents, l'empresa està instal·lant a l'escenari unes especials estufes que evitaran les corrents d'aire fred a la sala i als palcs.

Tant per a la disposició d'aquests aparells de calefacció com per al complicat muntatge de les decoracions pintades per La santa espina, el teatre Principal quedarà tancat dilluns, dimarts i dimecres d'aquesta setmana, tornant-se a obrir el dijous a la nit per a l'estrena de l'obra d'en Guimerà i en Morera.



Una poderosa empresa de Milà ho sol·licitat del nostre eximi Guimerà el permís de traduir i posar en escena a Itàlia l'obra de gran espectacle La santa espina, que s'estrenarà dijous al teatre Principal."

“Més èxits d’en Guimerà.

El drama Terra baixa ha sigut transformat en òpera amb el títol de La catalana, s’estrenarà en la Gran òpera de París el dia 15 de mars. La música és del mestre Leborne.

Un empresari de Milà ha demanat permís per traduir i representar la comèdia La santa espina.

La Acadèmia de Bones Lletres ha proposat a l’insigne Guimerà per candidat al premi Nobel del corrent any.”

La Escena catalana 16 (19/01/1907), p. 7.

“Vet aquí que una vegada hi havia un bover que es deia Gueridó i que estava enamorat d’una noia que es deia Maria. I com que justament la Maria era la noia de la casa, els seus pares se varen oposar a l’amor del bover i fins varen despatxar l’enamorat.

Això passava el dia abans de la Mare de Déu de Setembre, Patrona de la Maria. Per això la Maria havia dut un ram a la imatge de la Mare de Déu. I veus aquí que en Gueridó va pensar «Me n’enduré un record de la Maria.» I, quan ningú ho veia, va pujar a la cambra de la noia i se’n va endur el ram, fugint de la casa entre un gran esvalot de la gent que hi feia nit amb motiu de les veremes i que el creien lladre, a causa de ser lligat el ram amb una cadeneta d’or de la Maria, que justament hi guardava, en petit reliquiari, un bocí d’espina procedent de la corona de Jesucrist.

Com que en Gueridó tenia bona cama, no el varen poder aixarpar i ell va anar-se’n muntanyes a través fins que, al punt de la mitja nit, va trobar-se a la vall de les bruixes. I les bruixes, volent-lo protegir, varen embarcar-lo a bord d’una grossa sabata i se’l varen endur a una illa amb l’intent de fer-lo rei.

Justament el que regnava a les Abracandàries acabava de finar i va venir-los molt bé als bruixots i a les bruixes. No varen haver de fer altra cosa que encisar a l’hereu de la corona fent-lo tornar palmera i presentar a en Gueridó com al veritable hereu. I no solament a l’hereu de la corona varen fer tornar palmera, sinó a tots els nobles que anaven amb ell.

I ja tenim rei a en Gueridó. Però si les bruixes i els bruixots varen encisar els nobles i l’hereu de la corona, no varen fer lo mateix amb l’enamorada del príncep, que és una llei de sirena, enterada de tot lo que passa i prou manyosa per a saber-se guanyar la voluntat d’en Gueridó que, prenent-la per un jovencell, la nomena patge.

Vet aquí que quan ja feia temps que en Gueridó era rei, va arribar un vaixell carregat d’esclaus i d’esclaves. I entre aquestes esclaves hi havia cabalment la Maria.

Podeu comptar en Gueridó si va estar-ne, de content! Molt ho va estar... Però després va estar tot trist, perquè va veure que, vestit de rei, la noia no el coneixia... La sort va ser que el patge —l’enamorada del príncep encantat— va descobrir-ho tot, dient que tot lo que passava era degut a un encís i que l’encís se rompria així que en Gueridó deixés petonejar-se per una dona a qui estimés. I per a provar en Gueridó que era rei, fins va mostrar el ram amb la cadeneta de la santa espina, que havia tingut prou virtut per a mantenir les flors fresques.

I veus aquí que la Maria, ja casada amb en Gueridó, va segellar el seu amor amb una besada. I veus aquí que el príncep encantat i els barons del seu seguici varen deixar de ser palmeres... I veus aquí que el patge va tornar a ser dama i en Gueridó bover i la Maria pageseta... I veus aquí que bruixes i bruixots varen desbandar-se i varen aparèixer al lluny les muntanyes del Montserrat, símbol de la pàtria de la Maria i en Gueridó.

I a darrera la porta n'hi ha un fus, acabat amén Jesús...

Aquesta rondalla que us acabo de dir, és la que ha imaginat en Guimerà per a construir la seva obra de gran espectacle i màgia La santa espina... Obra poètica, una poesia frescal i plàcida, assaboridora per a xics i grans!... Dels seus vuit quadros se'n desprèn un perfum popular que encisa. La imaginació potenta d'en Guimerà he sapigut barrejar-hi la fantasia i la realitat, la llegenda i la vida, l'esperit supersticiós i la fe veritable. I aquesta barreja és amable i gentil, amb la amabilitat i la gentilesa de la literatura oral que hem heretat d'anteriors generacions, però amb el major valor de la forma altament culta d'un veritable artista.

En Morera ha posat música a la rondalla escènica. Si l'obra d'en Guimerà té caràcter de literatura popular, la música té caràcter de música popular. I lo que hem dit de la forma en la part literària, ho podem repetir respecte a la part musical. Realment, és una obra ben catalana en tota els seus conceptes, La santa espina.

Alguns dels nombres musicals varen entrar realment en e1 públic. Altres no hi varen entrar, però hi entraran. I el primer serà el que acompanya l'escena del segon acte en què els cavallers abracandaris juguen amb les espases, mentre l'Ulrich canta els versos que ja coneixen els nostres lectors.

La balada cantada pel mateix Ulrich al començ del mateix acte, té un extraordinari encís, com el té una hermosa sardana del acte tercer, original de forma i atraient d'inspiració. En aquet concepte mereix també elogis una melopea del tercer acte.

En resum, un poema dramàtic en el que lletra i música es fonen perfectament.

La santa espina ha estat muntada per en Graner amb veritable esplendidesa. En Vilomara ha decorat el primer acte... Bonica decoració la de la masia: bonica, característica i alegroia. La de la vall de les bruixes és poètica, amb una poesia suau i feréstega a la vegada.

Del segon acte se n'han encarregat en Moragas i l'Alarma que hi han mostrat l'experiència i la inspiració que les situacions requerien, però allà on sobretot han arribat a produir un efecte de meravella és en l'exterior del castell en què està el príncep hereu de les Abracandàries.

Aquelles muralles coronades per altes torres i besades pel mar remorejant, produeixen una impressió que no s'oblida. És una decoració que fins emociona per la seva pròpia virtut.

Finalment, són de molt efecte les decoracions que ha posat al tercer acte en Junyent. N'hi ha una de jardí que és molt simpàtica de tons, una de fantasiosa molt brillant i una de Montserrat que produeix una impressió de grandiositat.

La interpretació, molt ben dirigida pel mestre Urgell, va ser arrodonida. La Baró i en Santpere molt ajustats als papers de Maria i Gueridó. La gran escena del tercer acte varen fer-la de grans artistes. Mereixen també elogis la Paricio, la Morera, en Puiggener, en Balasch i en Puiggarí. Les mutacions, molt ben portades.

El públic va aplaudir molt el final de tots els actes i sobre tot al de l'últim, en què el teló no parava mai de pujar i baixar.

"[…] També fou un triomf per a nostre Guimerà i el mestre Morera l'estreno en el teatre Principal de la rondalla lírica La santa espina. És la darrera obra d'en Guimerà una producció originalíssima en què els elements còmics que a voltes ratllen en lo grotesc se fonen tan admirablement amb lo poètic i sentimental que fan un agredolç que l'espectador disfruta amb ver interès i emoció.

En Morera ha escrit unes quantes pàgines de música lleugera i inspirada quin principal mèrit és, al meu entendre, la seva perfecta adaptació amb l'esperit de la lletra. La cançó de l'espasa i una sardana d'escaient aire empordanès foren aplaudides amb molt entusiasme.

Les decoracions d'en Vilomara, Moragas i Alarma i Junyent produïren molt bona impressió puig casi totes són molt bones. I vagi la nostra més sincera felicitació a autors, pintors i empresa.

No rebentem per sistema. Que consti.

L'avi 20 (23/01/1907), p. 3.

"La santa espina, lletra de Guimerà i música de Morera, és, sens dubte, lo més gros que artísticament s'ha fet a can Graner. Se veu clarament que D. Àngel va escriure una obra per a lluïment dels escenògrafs més que per a son propi lluïment. A pesar d'això, no hi manca en el llibre la grapa genial de l'autor, que ha sabut harmonitzar en el transcurs de l'obra les escenes més grotesques amb els tocs poètics i sentimentals de més bon gust, qualitat que sap apreciar i estima amb preferència el públic aficionat a quest gènere d'espectacles.

Pot ser no té La santa espina aquella unitat i aquella gràcia ingènua de les sarsueles bufes que havien sigut un temps les obres predilectes dels barcelonins, però com a filla que és d'un gran literat i d'un gran patriota, se fa agradosa per son diàleg esmaltat de delicats pensaments i per la poesia, sempre de casa, que exhalen moltes de les situacions.

La música és hermosa; apropiada als moments, valenta, rica en harmonies i inspirada casi sempre. Sobresurten alguns números com el cant de l'espasa, el cor de bruixes i la sardana, que té molt color empordanès.

I ara tot el resto d'alabances pels decoradors. Totes les decoracions, originals dels nostres primers escenògrafs, són noves i esplèndides. La darrera de l'últim acte, d'en Junyent, un verdader panorama: Montserrat gran, majestuós, al fons d'una plana verda. La il·lusió és complerta. Van ser molt aplaudides també la primera de l'acte primer: una masia de part de fora, tot llum i color, i la del castell del segon, dels Srs. Moragas i Alarma, de notable efecte i amb un fons mogut i una perspectiva que és l'admiració de l'espectador intel·ligent.

La direcció, a la italiana, bastant bé."

La Esquella de la Torratxa 1465 (25/01/1907), p. 71.

"Dissabte de la setmana passada va estrenar-se en el teatre Principal de Barcelona una gran obra d'espectacle en tres actes, lletra de l'eminent dramaturg nostre benvolgut amic Àngel Guimerà, amb música del famós mestre Enric Morera, denominada La santa espina, inspirada en una rondalla popular.

L'obra ha sigut posada amb gran luxe, tant en trajos com en decorat; basti dir que s'han pintat vuit hermoses decoracions degudes al pinzell dels celebrats escenògrafs senyors Vilomara, Moragas i Alarma i Junyent.

Amb aquests elements aplegats, no cal dir si l'obra tingué èxit, alcançant-lo sorollós, per lo que felicitem a son autor, nostre distingit compatrici senyor Guimerà, felicitació que fem extensiva als seus col·laboradors.

En altre lloc d'aquest número publiquem unes inspirades Corrandes que canta el baríton senyor Puiggener en el segon acte."

El Baix Penedès 44 (26/01/1907), p. 3.

"La santa espina.—Rondalla en tres actes i vuit quadros, original d'Àngel Guimerà, música del Mtre. Enric Morera.

Se tracta d' una producció feta exprofessa per als Espectacles-Audicions Graner, de manera que inclou totes les condicions necessàries per un èxit. Amb un assumpte completament català, que respira ambient de casa, la fantasia del nostre dramaturg eminent s'ha esplaiat a terres llunyes i fins allí procura fer arribar nostres cançons, nostres costums, nostres idees.

Empleant l'humorisme propi d'aquests espectacles màgics, en Guimerà sintetitza uns quants caràcters, que, arrancats d'aquesta obra, poden per si sols construir un altre dels drames que tant renom han donat a l'autor de Terra baixa.

En Gueridó, es el bover d'una masia rica, un bon xicot que estima a la pubilla... un Manelic còmic, sense força brutal, però amb l'honradesa i l'amor d'aquell. El pobre xicot no compren com estimant a la María s'ha de privar de demostrar-ho en la forma que a ell li apateix i és fent-li una abraçada... i l'hi fa. La noia plora, creu que això és pecat (perquè encara ella no sap que el seu cor pateix per en Gueridó) i denuncia el fet a llurs pares, això motiva el despido del desgraciat bover de la masia, qui al veure que l'amo li paga la soldada per quedar en paus, exclama: "Quin mon més lleig s'ha tornat, i tant bonic com era!"

Per les amenaces del amo, no li queda altre remei que anar-se'n; mes abans creu prudent endur-se'n un record de sa estimada que guarda ella en sa cambra. És un ram de flors, lligat amb un cordó d'on penja una medalla, el reliquiari, una mica d'una espineta de la corona de Nostre Senyor, és la Santa espina. La cambra dona al carrer...: "Veiem si m'hi enfilo sense que em vegin... Sí que puc, sí... Veiem si ella hi és?.. No hi ha ningú: només el ram! El vaig a prendre. Ja és meu!"

Mes, ai, que al saltar dintre comença a sentir-se remor de veus que s'apropen amb so de guitarres. Gent que ve a festejar la pubilla... troben al lladregot, tothom l'increpa i ell no sap que respondre, sols busca la fugida i ho fa passant per damunt de tots... i fuig, fuig a un lloc a on no el trobin els que e1 persegueixen, anant a raure a un lloc arran del mar, conegut per la gent del poble per Lo vall de las bruixes. És allí on en Gueridó diu aquets hermosos hendecasíl·labs: [...]

Aquí comença l'espectacle màgic. Toquen les dotze de la nit i acudeixen bruixes, bruixots i esperits malignes. Troben el fugitiu i se'n vanaglorien, tant, que pensen fer-lo rei. Ja està dit, el fan rei. Sense escoltar las protestes del pobre bover, se l'enduen a un país llunyà, on per art de la bruixeria transformen el Gueridó en Arnolt.

Amb riquesa de detalls ens transporta l'autor a llocs imaginaris, ens entreté amb unes escenes altament còmiques i amb altres completament passionals; ens fa escoltar balades d'un joglar i ens fa sentir 1'amor platònic d'un príncep i una sirena de la mar. Entre mig de tanta poesia, venen els bruixots i fan de las seves, metamorfosant al príncep i als seus magnats... En Gueridó ja és Rei!

Passem de llarg els detalls del argument del segon acte i bona part del tercer i anem al final. En Guerídó, no viu feliç, enyora a sa estimada, per ella ho daria tot... Els seus corsaris fan viatges a distints països cercant dones per a oferir-les al Rei perquè escolli la que mes li agradi per casar-s'hi.

Veiem lo que diu un capità de corsaris que ve amb un vaixell, acabat de desembarcar, a qui li pregunten d'on du la presa: "D'una terra llunyana, on tot és verdor i alegria". [...]

Amb quina senzillesa i amor diu que ve de Catalunya!... Se presenten les noies, ballen a estil del seu país i alegra el veure com se commou el Rei al sentir las tonades de la sardana ballada per aquella gent que el reconeix...

"Gent de la meva terra, balleu, canteu, rigueu. Volteu-me d'alegria de l'aire que porteu, que aquí em sento que em moro!"

Com és de preveure, entre les noies robades hi ha la Maria, que ell reconeix, agafa, estreny amb son cos i s'hi descobreix, desenrotllant-se l'escena que publiquem en altre part d'aquest número, que resulta commovedora i d'un afecte sorprenent.

La música hi està justificada; en Morera s'ha identificat en 1'obra i l'acompanya amb les notes justes a la lletra. Tots els números, que són molts, s'aplaudeixen, i alguns tenen que repetir-se.

En 1'execució totes las figures hi estan bé. En Santpere està molt encaixat amb el paper de Gueridó. En Puiggener i en Balasch sigueren aplaudits amb ses cançons. En Puiggarí, en Balot, en Garcia, en Tor, en Giralt, en Morató, en Vinyals, en Ferràndiz, en Baró i en Riu compliren molt bé son comés.

Las actrius Morera, Baró i Paricio, admirables. La Ricart, la Vendrell, la Ferràndiz, la Vidal, la Huguet i la Gallinat, molt correctes. Les vuit decoracions que s'exhibeixen són de gran efecte i de molt mèrit; perteneixen als celebrats escenògrafs Vilomara, Moragas, Alarma i Junyent; tots foren aplaudits. Els autors sigueren victorejats, tenint que presentar-se en escena un grapat de vegades. Tenim obra per dies."

“El Mtre. Enric Morera

Nous triomfs

Dues noves proves del seu talent genial dintre el bell art de la Música acaba de donar darrerament nostre distingit i apreciat amic el Mtre. D. Enric Morera, l’ilustre autor d’Emporium i Bruniselda i afortunat desvetllador i conseqüent conreador de les melodies populars de Catalunya, aqueixes melodies que encarnen i respiren tots els sentiments i ambient de nostra beneïda terra.

Així El Mestre com La santa espina, obres líriques de l’expressat compositor estrenades la setmana passada a Barcelona, afermen la ja acreditada personalitat musical de tan aplaudit Mestre, quin retrato avui publiquem, reproducció de un dibuix inèdit fet pel notable artista en Miquel Utrillo l’any 1897 en ocasió d’estrenar-se en aquesta vila La fada de l’estany, del propi Mtre. Enric Morera.

En particular la darrera de las dues noves produccions pot ben calificar-se de verdadera joia musical, com ho resulta també literària.

Sobre la preciosa lletra de l’eminent Guimerà, el Mtre. Morera ha fet hermoses filigranes; sobresortint d’una manera especial la delicada sardana del tercer acte que canten les donzelles catalanes i quina lletra és com segueix: [...]

Així mateix, està admirablement adaptada la música del cant que a l’Amor adreça un joglar al començament del segon acte, la lletra del qual és aquesta: [...]

També és notabilíssima la música de la Cançó del Pastor, la de la serenata del primer acte i la de les corrandes de «L’Espasa».

A més de lo abans copiat com a mostra de que la lletra de La santa espina fa molt bona parella amb la música, no podem resistir a la temptació de donar a conèixer als nostres llegidors la magnifica descripció que el gran Guimerà fa de l’hermosa terra catalana per boca d’un dels personatges de la seva obra. Parla així: [...]

Felicitem de tot cor a l’eminent Mtre. Morera pel seu nou triomf artístic, i afegim els nostres aplausos als entusiàstics que el públic en cada nova representació li tributa.”

“Guimerà y Morera

En el teatro Principal, de Barcelona, se ha estrenado con éxito una obra de Guimerà, La santa espina, a la que ha puesto música el maestro Morera.

Se trata de una deliciosa fábula, al estilo de las antiguas consejas con que las abuelas entretienen a los pequeñuelos.

He aquí el argumento de la obra, que ha sido puesta en escena con gran lujo.

Un pobre pasto se enamora perdidamente de la garrida hija de sus amos, y ésta, confiada o inocente, lo aviva con infantiles coqueterías, obligando al pastor a que la ayude en la formación de un ramo que dedica en ofrenda a la Virgen, y que sujeta con una cadenita de oro, de la que pende un escapulario con un fragmento de la «Santa espina» a falta de cinta.

Enardecido el pastor, quiero robar un beso a los purpurinos labios de su amada, que forcejea y grita hasta que acuden sus padres, y enterados del atrevimiento del mozo le arrojan de la «masía».

Resígnase el pastor a su mala suerte; pero decidido a llevarse un recuerdo de la mujer amada, trepa a su ventana y roba el ramo, no sin ser descubierto y debiéndose hacer paso a viva fuerza para librarse de las iras de los demás mozos.

Huyendo desolado, llega hasta la playa, donde brujas, duendes y trasgos le toman bajo su protección, y en siniestro buque lo trasladan a lejanos países para coronarle Rey.

En el país elegido habita un Príncipe a quien los hados vaticinaron que al conocer el amor se trocaría en planta y a quien, nuevo Segismundo, su padre le ha encerrado en un castillo aislado, en una isla escondida, para evitar el fallo del Destino.

Pero éste se cumple: en vano pretenden distraerlo sus cortesanos con juegos y luchas; el amor ha hecho presa en el Príncipe, y en el silencio de la noche baja al almenado torreón, desde donde escucha el canto de la sirena convertida en mujer, quo se arroja en sus brazos.

Al unir los labios los dos amantes, el destino se cumple: los duendes llegan al castillo en su buque fantasma; el Príncipe se convierte en palmera, y el pastor sustituye al Príncipe y ocupa el trono, que la muerte del Rey le ofrece con rara oportunidad.

Y he aquí a Gueridó hecho un Monarca, no muy feliz, pues recuerda sus amores, que solo confía a la sirena, convertida en paje, y su favorito desde que en el torreón solitario encontró el ramo que perdiera el pastor.

También está sometido al destino: tiene prohibido unirse a una mujer en un año para no perder el trono, y la sirena, que quiera destruir el encantamiento que sujeta a su amado Príncipe, procura por todos los medios hacer que el falso Rey ame a una mujer.

Gueridó, que recuerda sus pasados amores, mira con indiferencia a cuantas bellas le presentan; el plazo expira, y el pastor hubiera sido Rey indefinidamente si un buque corsario no trajera de las costas catalanas un cargamento de cautivas, entre las que figura la «pubilla» de la «masía» que robó el corazón de Gueridó.

Como era de esperar, éste se casa con su bella catalana; el encantamiento se deshace, los duendes huyen despavoridos y el Príncipe y la sirena se unen triunfantes y dichosos.

La música con que ha adornado la obra el Sr. Morera es fácil e inspirada, especialmente la «Canción de la espada», valiente y muy original."

"[…] I com que el teatre nacional ens ha donat també l'obra de dos mestres, veus aquí que la setmana ha estat de les més aprofitades que hem pogut registrar de un bon temps a aquesta banda.

Aquesta obra nacional és La santa espina, d'en Guimerà i en Morera, estrenada al Principal.

L'autor de la lletra la califica de rondalla. I ho és en tota l'extensió, tant pel caràcter dels personatges, com per l'acció en què es belluguen. Lo meravellós i lo real es barregen en l'obra, de la mateixa manera que es barregen en la literatura oral transmesa d'avis a nets durant el transcurs dels segles. Un pastor estima la noia de la casa on serveix. Els amos el treuen i ell se'n du, com a record, un ram que la noia havia posat davant de la Verge, lligat amb una cadena que conté un reliquiari. I ja tenim al bover per munt-enllà, trobant una colla de bruixes i bruixots que per a protegir-lo el fan rei. Els incidents a què això dona lloc són tots pintorescos, acabant amb l'arribada d'un vaixell corsari que du esclaus de Catalunya i entre aquests esclaus l'estimada del bover, que s'hi casa, rebent d'ella un petó que desfà l'encís i transforma un altre cop el rei en pastor, alhora que el rei legítim (transformat abans en palmera), torna a la vida humana.

És impossible donar compte de tots els episodis de l'obra, puix se succeeixen com les imatges d'un somni agradós contat per un poeta de volada i fet doblement atractiu per una música alegra i seriosa, sabia i popular i plena de caràcter.

Tots els elements s'han fos perfectament en La santa espina: poesia suau, gronxadora, inspirada; música ben adaptada a les situacions, i decorat esplèndid, puix en Vilomara, en Moragas, l'Alarma i en Junyent han rivalitzat en presentar al públic uns quadros ara grandiosos, ara bonics, ara fantasiats, ara reals... Tots ells tenen cosa bona; tots ells s'han mostrat com a mestres que són. I veus aquí que tot són mestres aquesta setmana.

El vestuari es també ric i la interpretació resulta arrodonida per part de tots els elements que formen la companyia del Principal. Per tot lo dit, no és d'estranyar que l'obra hagi obtingut un èxit sorollós i ben merescut. Dintre el seu gènere, La santa espina és un model. [...]

"El novell autor dramàtic don Àngel Guimerà acaba d'obtenir un nou i senyalat triomf amb La santa espina. El públic se la va empassar de seguida. És una obra que es farà moltes vegades. En Ramon Vidales, que coneix molt l'autor de quan amb ell havia jugat a bales al Vendrell, diu que aquesta Espina és l'obra de més punta de l'Àngel. (Textual).

Respecte a la música d'en Morera, ens hem assessorat amb en Llopart i diu que és molt grossa. (També textual).

Lo cert és que el sol anunci d'aquesta sensacional estrena va bastar per a que s'omplís de gom a gom el Principal... i l'entresuelo.

Per a la diada d'avui no s'ha decidit encara res, doncs ja és sabut que en aquesta casa les innocentades estan contínuament a l'ordre del dia. No obstant, s'ha enunciat en els cartells "Gran funció. Gran aconteixement. Gran programa."

Ja se sap: per grans a cal Graner."

"Teatre Principal.—Amb l'èxit més complet va celebrar-se en aquest teatre, el dissabte 19 dels corrents, l'estrena de La santa espina, rondalla lírica en tres actes, lletra de n'Àngel Guimerà, música de l'Enric Morera. L'inagotable fantasia del gran dramaturg català ha traçat un argument nou i d'interès sempre creixent, qual acció moguda se desenrotlla dintre la major senzillesa, essent conduïda a un desenllaç del millor efecte teatral. El caràcter idíl·lic d'algunes escenes, pintades amb un naturalisme de bona llei, contrasta amb l'ambient fantasiós que predomina en lo restant de l'obra, emmaridant-se feliçment lo real amb lo imaginari, de lo que en resulta una obra de gran originalitat i d'un bell i ric color que encisa verament a l'espectador.

En Morera ha compost per a La santa espina una valiosa partitura que pot comptar-se entre les millors que ha produint per a aquell teatre. Encara que ha sigut escrita en un espai de temps relativament curt (puix l'empresa l'havia encarregada abans al mestre Vives i així s'havia anunciat al començament de la temporada), el treball del fecund compositor no en surt pas gaire perjudicat. La major part dels números són d'una factura ben cuidada i la inspiració hi raja sempre distingida i fàcil.

En el primer acte sobresurten l'alegre cor de veremadors i l'animada escena de les bruixes, molt ben tractada en l'orquestra. En l'acte segon se fa aplaudir per son hermós lirisme la balada i la cançó de l'espasa, que canta el joglar, guardant també un bonic color tota l'escena del príncep amb la sirena. El final, amb son moviment de l'arribada del vaixell i l'encantament general de l'escena distreu un xic l'atenció, però entremig ressalten motius prou de relleu, com el del cor d'embruixadors, d'entonacions i ritmes ben apropiats. Al tercer acte l'ambient catalanesc hi desplega tota sa ufana i escampa arreu sa flaira. Després del bonic ballet oriental, que es recomana per la seva delicada melodia, heus aquí la més joliu inspiració de l'obra: el cor de captives catalanes, ple de gràcia i frescor, el qual s'enllaça amb una sardana tant airosament ritmada i de sonoritat tant lluminosa, que totes les nits, a l'acabar-se, un gran esclat d'aplaudiments la corona. Per son sentiment popular es també notable i se fa escoltar amb plena delectació el fragment orquestral que acompanya, en el mateix acte, la poètica descripció de la terra catalana.

Si al valor del llibre i de la música s'hi afegeix el magnífic decorat que han pintat els reputats escenògrafs senyors Vilomara, Moragas, Alarma i Junyent, se comprendrà que les representacions de La santa espina constitueixin actualment l'èxit teatral més gros de la temporada. Dediquem, abans d'acabar, l'elogi merescut als artistes que més s'han distingit en el desempeny de llur paper, senyores Baró, Paricio i Morera, i senyors Santpere, Puiggener, Balasch i Puiggarí."

"La escenografía en Barcelona

Barcelona, patria del gran maestro escenógrafo, de aquel insigne Soler i Rovirosa que, con las concepciones de su genio, a tanta altura colocó esa especialidad del arte. Barcelona, digo, atraviesa un periodo tal de actividad, que está, muy lejos de parecérsele otro alguno de los de mayor producción y que la hacen interesantísimo para la Historia de esta rama del arte.

Gracias a la esplendidez, afán de novedad y buen gusto del empresario Sr. Graner, menudean los estrenos de espectáculos exornados con nuevas y espléndidas decoraciones en las que diríase que se agotan los inagotables recursos de las combinaciones de la línea y del color, de la luz y de las sombras, en tan variadas y múltiples decoraciones, buscadas en distintas fuentes de la inspiración, desde lo puramente real a lo más fantástico.

Por esto, aunque haya de ser muy pálida la idea que de algunas de ellas pueda dar el grabado, ofrecemos a nuestros lectores las muestras adjuntas de otras tantas decoraciones de La santa espina, que indudablemente nos agradecerán cuantos no tengan ocasión de ver las obras originales, y especialmente los aficionados a saborear las creaciones del arte.

La santa espina es el título de una obra teatral que su autor D. Àngel Guimerà la denomina Rondalla en tres actes, puesta en música por D. Enrique Morera, y que actualmente está proporcionando muy buenas entradas al teatro Principal."

La hormiga de oro 6 (09/02/1907), p. 86.

"Para mañana miércoles se anuncian en el teatro Principal tres representaciones de la aplaudidísima obra de Guimerà y Morera, La santa espina, la primera tendrá lugar a las tres y media de la tarde, la segunda a las seis y la tercera a las nueve y media de la noche."

La Publicidad 20202 (12/02/1907), ed. matí, p. 2.

"Amb motiu de la centèsima representació de La santa espina, va celebrar-se el dimecres l'anunciada funció en honor dels autors, l'eminent dramaturg Angel Guimerà i el no menos celebrat mestre Enric Morera. Tota la nit va ser un continuo d'ovacions delirants, les que sortí a rebre des del palco escènic l'autor de la lletra, per trobar-se malalt a Sitges el mestre Morera.

Va ser molt aplaudida una melodia que canta amb molta entonació i refinat gust en Puiggener, titulada L'enterro composta per en Morera i instrumentada per en Lamote. En la representació de la comèdia La sala de espera van lluir-s'hi molt la Morera, en Santpere en Puiggarí i en García.

El dissabte vinent estreno de Ton i Guida traduït d'en Margall i en Ribera.

Tots els artistes que prengueren part en la funció participaren dels aplausos del públic que omplia de gom a gom el teatre."

La Escena catalana 25 (23/03/1907), p. 5.

"[...] Si buen éxito alcanzaron La nit de Reis y Gaziel, no fue menor el obtenido por La santa espina, obra en tres actos, original de Guimerà la letra y de Morera la música.

El estreno de La santa espina fue un verdadero acontecimiento artístico; pocas veces se había visto en los teatros de Barcelona tanta suntuosidad en el decorado, tanta magnificencia en el attrezzo.

Las decoraciones, admirablemente pintadas por los notables escenógrafos Sres. Vilomara, Junyent, Moragas y Alarma, son de una bellísima y grandiosa perspectiva, que profundamente impresiona nuestros sentimientos artísticos.

El libro, tierna rondalla de Àngel Guimerà, es de una encantadora y poética sencillez en algunos pasajes; en otros, aparece exuberante de gracia y escenas hay que son de admirable y conmovedora intensidad sentimental. En toda la obra se respira un sano ambiente; en toda ella, expresa nuestro gran dramaturgo la inagotable virilidad de su alma de poeta.

La música, de Morera, es verdaderamente catalana, en ella demuestra su autor una vez más un profundo estudio de la técnica instrumental, que va unida a una delicadísima inspiración. […]

"Ahir a la tarda va estrenar-se al Principal una sarsueleta arranjada del francès per l'actor Puiggarí amb el títol de L'ajudant.

És una obreta d'acció entretinguda i que conserva en els episodis el caràcter d'original, encara que vestit per l'arranjador amb detalls que donen als personatges un aire barceloní. El diàleg és sempre natural i conté bon nombre d'acudits.

Per a aquesta obreta en Grant ha escrit alguns trossos de música ben adaptats a les situacions. La interpretació va ser molt encertada par part de tots els artistes. El públic va acollir l'obreta amb mostres d'aprovació, demanant a l'autor diferentes vegades."

"L'ajudant.— Joguet còmic-líric en un acte i en prosa, arranjat del francès per Lluís Puiggarí.

El traductor ha volgut catalanitzar un vaudeville i això no pot aconseguir-se sense fer l'obra nova de cap a peus, puig els personatges inverossímils de què es valen els autors francesos no fan pel nostre públic, i si a aquests se'ls dona un aire barceloní, encara ens resulten més falsos.

El Sr. Puiggarí ha demostrat posseir condició per a fer una obra original, doncs, per què no ha canviat per complert les situacions de L'ajudant i l'ha esporgat del color afrancesat que el rodeja? Sols fent-ho així s'haurien de trasplantar les obres d'un teatre foraster, per exemple, tal com ho feia l'Aulés en sa primera època.

Al fer aquesta observació, no volem suposar que la comèdia de què ens ocupem deixi d'agradar, ja que conté escenes purament còmiques i d'efecte segur en l'execució.

Cregui'ns l'arranjador, pensi un argument de casa, desenrotlli'l en forma catalana i firmi l'original, que, amb seguretat, en sortirà més orgullós que trasplantant obres franceses, quins arguments ja estem cansats de veure en mes o menys variants, en nostres escenaris."

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

[Els personatges que apareixen mencionats a la partitura són la Mery, don Lluís i la Rosa.

La partitura té un preludi instrumental en temps de dansa seguit del primer número que canta la Mery recordant un home del qual es va enamorar, un segon número que canta don Lluís, un tercer número que canten en forma de conversa la Mery i don Lluís en què ell n'ha vist l'anunci i va a la clínica de la Mery fingint estar malalt, un quart número de vals [no representat] en què Lluís li declara que l'estima i es lamenta de no poder correspondre'l, i un breu final instrumental en temps de dansa].

Ressenyes de premsa:

"La joguina Cura radical pertany al gènere tan predilecte de l'Aulés, en què el quid pro quo, avalorat per un raig d'acudits graciosos, constitueix l'interès principal. Per a acabar de donar caràcter a l'obreta, fins bona part del diàleg és escrit en vers, formant quartetes rodones.

El malalt que es cura radicalment és un metge que, per a guarir-se del mal de l'amor, acut a una jova metgessa molt eixerida i molt simpàtica. I la metgessa, que des del primer moment li coneix el mal, acaba donant-li remei amb un sí d'allò més posat en ordre. A més d'això hi ha moltes escenes preparatòries de gran sabor còmic, atestades de pessigollaires sortides.

La música del mestre Grant és ben apropiada al gènere de l'obra: senzilla i airosa. La interpretació, justa per part de tots els artistes: Maria Morera, Puiggarí, Garcia... En el paper de la noia que es mal i remei a la vegada per al jove metge, va debutar la novella actriu lírica senyoreta Morató, de la que no havíem tingut abans cap notícia. A judicar per lo que fa en Cura radical, pot esperar-se que farà a les taules una brillant carrera. Diu amb naturalitat i intenció, es mou amb naturalitat i elegància i no força mai la nota. Creiem que en la companyia del Principal pot ocupar-hi un bon lloc al costat de la Morera, la Paricio i les altres que formen tan bon conjunt."

"El diumenge a la tarda va estrenar-se a can Graner una joguina firmada per l'Aulés, titulada Cura radical i posada en música per en Grant. És cosa que fa passar l'estona divertida. Els actors hi treballen fi, havent-hi debutat una tal Morató (aviat no ens hi entendrem) que em va semblar que ho feia molt bé. I consti que el meu amic que firma amb el mateix cognom[55] no me l'ha recomanada, puix el debut de la nova artista ha estat la primera notícia que ha tingut d'ella. Ja veuen doncs que l'elogi no pot ser interessat.

I vinguen Moratós. Al Principal sol ja n'hi ha tres: una actriu, un actor, i, segons m'han dit, un que toca a l'orquestra. Endavant: com més serem, més riurem. [...]

"Cura radical.— Comèdia lírica en un acte i en vers, d'Eduard Aulés, amb música del Mtre. Grant.

Aquest veterà autor és incansable i el seu numen inesgotable, tenint en compte que es val de tots els artificis teatrals, amb més o menys llicència, per a produir obres escèniques semi originals. Diem això perquè, sense que ens consti (ja que el cartell no ho declara) de si Cura radical és o no és un arreglo, veiem en tal obreta cert aire "vodevillesc", i si és així, està ben disfressat i sobretot és d'aplaudir el que sigua escrita en vers, això quan menys ja és un mèrit innegable pel firmant. I per construir versos per comèdies de broma no es pot negar que l'autor de Cinc minuts fora del món hi té la mà trencada.

Quatre personatges juguen en Cura radical i tres d'ells són nous per nosaltres, l'altre és un vell que ha perdut la memòria i estem ja cansats d'aplaudir-lo en numeroses ocasions i sobretot el tenim molt ben retratat en el senyor Cosme d'Un mercat de Calaf de l'immortal Pitarra, i l'Anton dels Tres toms, del malograt Campmany.

En resum: l'obreta és eixerida i s'escolta amb agrado, interessant l'argument i rient els xistos que amb la versificació hi entortolliga l'autor. Va ser molt aplaudit i celebrat en general per un selecte públic que omplia el teatre. Van ajudar a l'èxit els mèrits dels actors Santpere i Garcia, i les actrius Morera i Morató; aquesta última va debutar en aquell dia amb bon peu, puig sigué aplaudida en son monòleg-preludi i agradà molt cantant. El Mtre. Grant també sigué aplaudit i sortí a les taules junt amb el veterà Aulés."

“Finalment hem de parlar d’un altre arranjament: Cura radical de l’Aulés, posat al Principal amb música d’en Grant. També és obra de tip de riure.

Lo més interessant és que amb l’estrena de Cura radical ha debutat la senyoreta Morató i Bonet, que és una petita artista ben simpàtica, dient amb naturalesa i picardia i sense caure en exageracions grotesques. Si en altres obres està a la mateixa altura, creiem que es poden posar en la Morató i Bonet fermes esperances.

[56] Aprofitant l'èxit de La santa espina, dels mateixos autors, Guimerà reutilitza aquests dos quadres de la seva tragèdia Jesús de Nazareth, també amb música d'Enric Morera, i els adapta afegint Lo cant de les ploraneres i Lo cant de la mort. La nova visió musical s'estrena commemorant la centena representació de La santa espina.

[57] Degut a la durada de La santa espina, es canvia l'horari de les sessions dels diumenges perquè pugui afegir-se aquest quadro líric a la sessió, que a la tarda seran a les 15:15 i a les 18:00 (La Publicidad (08/03/1907), edició nit, p. 3).

[58] En aquest moment, Soler i Rovirosa ja era mort. Es va recuperar la seva escenografia original per al Jesús de Nazareth de 1894, obra de la qual s'havien extret també els fragments literaris que composaven aquesta nova visió musical.

[CDMAE: Reg. 234270]. Aquesta seria l'escenografia recuperada per a la producció de Lluís Graner de* La resurrecció de Llàtzer.

"[Jonàs] Torna a dintre. Se sent lo ferro gratant en la roca. Roboam lo crida del forat de la cova sense que se'l vegi mentre baixa. Va sense llum." "Jonàs, sortint del sepulcre." "Segueix treballant dintre." "Surt Jonàs amb un cabàs ple de pedruscall i les eines sobre."

"ROBOAM, JONÀS, LLÀTZER, MARTA, MARIA, NICODEMUS, sacerdots, tocadors de flauta, ploraneres. Llarga comitiva portant lo cadàver de Llàtzer. Davallen poc a poc. Venen amb atxes que emeten claror rogenca, esmorteïda."

"En ser en mig de l'escena deixen el baiard amb el cadàver en terra. El volta tothom. Para la música." "Els que han portat a Llàtzer tornen a agafar el baiard per dur-lo a la sepultura. Marta i Maria es tiren sobre el mort plorant i ells deixen un altre cop lo baiard a terra."

"Nicodemus fa que tornin a alçar el cadàver. Se l'enduen al sepulcre."

“Elles s’abracen plorant. Nicodemus les hi parla mentre Jonàs, ajudat de Roboam i altres homes, fiquen el cadàver a la sepultura i la cobreixen amb la llosa.”

“Piquen en la llosa. Amb el soroll, Marta i Maria es donen compte que ja està enterrat.” “Jonàs escura les eines a un costat.” “S’il·lumina suaument l’entrada de la cova.” “En aquest moment apareix Jesús a l’entrada de la cova i va baixant. En tant que baixa, grans remors de tothom. Poc a poc els crits s’apaguen. Quan és abaix, silenci general.”

“Cau la llosa a trossos. Sols es veu la foscor a dintre. Exclamació d’espant de tothom, que es fa enrere. Pausa.” “Es veu Llàtzer que, enmig de la foscor, automàticament es va aixecant, avançant i sortint encara cobert amb la mortalla. Gran remor de tothom d’admiració i terror, caient de genolls.”

Ressenyes de premsa:

"Para mañana se anuncia en el teatro Principal el estreno de la Resurrecció de Llàtzer, visión sacada de la obra de gran espectáculo Jesús de Nazareth, por sus autores Guimerà, de la letra, y Morera, el cual ha anotado algún número de música. La obra será representada en la forma a que nos tiene acostumbrado el señor Graner y contando para la misma con el espléndido decorado de los señores Vilomara y Soler i Rovirosa."

El Diluvio 64 (05/03/1907), ed. tarda, pp. 3–4.

"Principal.— Ayer estrenose en este teatro con gran éxito la visión musical La resurrecció de Llàtzer, que el poeta Guimerà entresacó de su Jesús de Nazareth.

La obra es un bello acierto evocador. La poesía bíblica se hace dominadora en sugestión. Y la fuerza plástica de las escenas triunfa bellamente.

La música del maestro Morera es siempre adaptada a la índole y letra de la visión. Y está toda ella melancolizada con bíblica maestría.

El éxito que ayer obtuvo la obra es, pues, muy merecido."

"Quelcom de gran me corlliga i m'enronda d'un perfum de miracle... He sentit —he sentit!— com ressuscitava Llàtzer obeint a la paraula del Crist. El meu cor de creient ha bategat amb força, tol el meu ser ha brunzit d'emoció... Crec que ha estat una de les poques vegades en què m'he trobat junyit per la sublimitat d'un moment artístic.

No he estat al teatre; he estat dintre l'obra, bressat per una pluja d'inspiració del poeta, per una pluja d'inspiració del músic... Les idees han volat per l'aire; harmonies i melodies s'han fos amb les idees, les figures del pas bíblic han passat pel meu davant com en un somni enartador... I l'esperit se n'ha inundat...

Jo ja ho esperava, que l'obra m'impressionaria. Doncs m'ha impressionat més del que esperava... la lectura m'havia subjugat; la representació m'ha deixat com esmaperdut... El poema escènic, fonent-se amb el poema musical, entren fins a lo més pregon de l'ànima i li encomanen un esgarrifament de prodigi. Enlairat poema! Embriagadora música!

He sentit la resurrecció de Llàtzer!... L'he sentida amb el cor i mentre la sentia m'ha semblat que em trobava davant per davant d'una cosa mai sentida...

I entre aquells versos i aquelles harmonies he vist moure's una multitud esgarrifada pel miracle... I l'he vista moure com una veritable multitud, però sense fer perdre relleu a les figures principals del quadro...

Cal que us ho digui, que si l'obra impressiona, els comediants han posat tota la seva voluntat i tot el seu talent al servei dels autors?... Si ara us parlés de la Morera i la Baró fent les germanes de Llàtzer; si us parlés d'en Puiggarí fent el Nicodemus, d'en Tor fent el Jesús, d'en Santpere fent el Jonàs, d'en Balot fent el Llàtzer o d'en Vinyals fent el Roboam, me semblaria que empetiteixo quelcom la impressió que m'ha deixat l'obra. Quan aquesta impressió ha estat tan intensa i tan sencera, senyal que tothom hi ha posat el coll per a fer-ne apreciar les qualitats.

Amb La resurrecció de Llàtzer en Graner ha tingut la bona pensada de fer una altra resurrecció: la del esplèndid decorat que va pintar per a l'episodi —quan formava part del Jesús de Nazareth—el malaguanyat Soler i Rovirosa. Ha fet bé en Graner; no hauria estat just si s'hagués oblidat d'aquell mestre de l'escenografia.

Aneu-la a veure, La resurrecció de Llàtzer, que és una obra mestra feta per tres mestres... Guimerà, Morera, Soler y Rovirosa...

"En cada una de las dos funciones del próximo domingo por la tarde en el teatro Principal se pondrán en escena la famosa obra La santa espina y la nueva visión de Guimerà y Morera La resurrecció de Llàtzer.

Debido a la duración del espectáculo, la primera sesión empezará a las tres y cuarto y la segunda a las seis en punto."

"Al teatre Principal de Barcelona s'ha estrenat amb gran èxit una visió musical en un acte i dos quadros, denominada La resurrecció de Llàtzer, extreta del drama bíblic Jesús de Nazareth, per son mateix autor nostre apreciat amic Àngel Guimerà, essent la música del mestre Enric Morera.

La premsa fa molts elogis de la nova obra del gran Guimerà, així com també de la música de l'eminent Morera, a qui felicitem pel sorollós èxit que acaben d'obtindre."

El Baix Penedès 0050 (09/03/1907), p. 3.

"Visió dramàtica musical en un acte i dos quadros en vers d'Àngel Guimerà i música d'Enric Morera.

Amb molt bon encert en Graner ha escollit un fragment de la gran obra d'en Guimerà, Jesús de Nazareth i n'ha fet una visió pels seus Espectacles-Audicions, visió que resulta un efecte plàstic hermosíssim.

El text és tal com es va presentar per en Borràs al Novetats, sols s'han afegit els versos del Cant de les ploraneres i Cant de la mort (que publiquem en altre lloc d'aquest número). L'autor no ha tingut necessitat de retocar res, puig aquest acte per si sol enclou una acció sencera d'efecte extraordinari i d'interès i atractiu per l'espectador. [...] Ajuda a l'èxit una preciosa decoració del cèlebre escenògraf Maurici Vilomara i el decorat del final d'acte pintat pel malograt Soler i Rovirosa, quin decorat és el mateix que ha lluït sempre en els teatres de Novetats i Tívoli.

El mestre Morera ha afegit la música corresponent a les cançons abans dites i un preludi, produint bon efecte i fent-se aplaudir en tots els passatges. En conjunt, el quadro resulta lo millor que en aquest gènere hem vist en els Espectacles-Audicions Graner, i el públic ho justifica demanant amb insistència la presentació dels autors a l'escenari."

La Escena catalana 023 (09/03/1907), p. 3.

"En Guimerà ha agafat la seva obra Jesús de Nazareth, n'ha desglossat un fragment i l'ha muntat com una obra solta -amb molta solta per cert-; en Morera ha agafat la música que en altre temps havia escrit per al Jesús, hi ha fet unes manipulacions que ell se sap i n'hi ha afegit alguns trossos; en Graner s'ha proporcionat un parell de decoracions que per a la mateixa obra havia pintat el difunt i gran escenògraf Soler i Rovirosa i les ha adaptades al escenari del Principal; la companyia ha estudiat la cosa, y ves aquí una obra magnífica, que emociona fondament, suggestionant l'esperit amb un perfum de meravella.

Perquè La resurrecció de Llàtzer que ens ofereix en Graner com a torna de La santa espina és cosa per encisar-s'hi. El pa és bo, és gustos i abunda, però la torna, si no abunda tant, potser es encara més bona i més gustosa. És un moment artístic d'aquells que es recorden anys. Jo ja hi he estat sis vegades i encara penso aprofitar-ho alguna altra, perquè de coses així no se'n veuen tots els dies. Ni tots els anys.

Virolet"
Cu-cut! 251 (14/03/1907), p. 168.

"[...] ha produït fonda impressió. El quadro, desglossat del Jesús de Nazareth, viu amb vida pròpia i té potser més relleu del que tenia dintre l'hermosa tragèdia d'en Guimerà. El nostre gran tràgic hi mou la multitud i fa brunzir les fibres més intimes de l'espectador, fent-li passar a frec de testa com un buf de miracle.

Per la seva banda en Morera ha adaptat també la música a les exigències de l'arranjament i ha ajudat amb la força de la seva inspiració a donar intensitat a l'obra. Finalment, en Graner –delicat empresari– ha tingut la bona pensada de proporcionar-se per a La resurrecció de Llàtzer el magnífic decorat que va pintar el malaguanyat Soler i Rovirosa.

Tot això i una interpretació brillant per part de tots els artistes, fa que La resurrecció de Llàtzer deixi un record ben viu en tots els que presencien la representació. [...]

"[...] Senyalem, per fi, la funció extraordinària que es donà el dia 20 en honor dels senyors Guimerà i Morera, amb motiu de celebrar-se en tal dia la centèsima representació de La santa espina. Actualment acompanya a aquesta obra en el programa la visió en un acte i dos quadros, dels mateixos autors, La resurrecció de Llàtzer, que ha sigut acomodada per al Principal de l'obra Jesús de Nazareth. L'efecte que produeix en aquell teatre és gran i causa una emoció intensíssima."

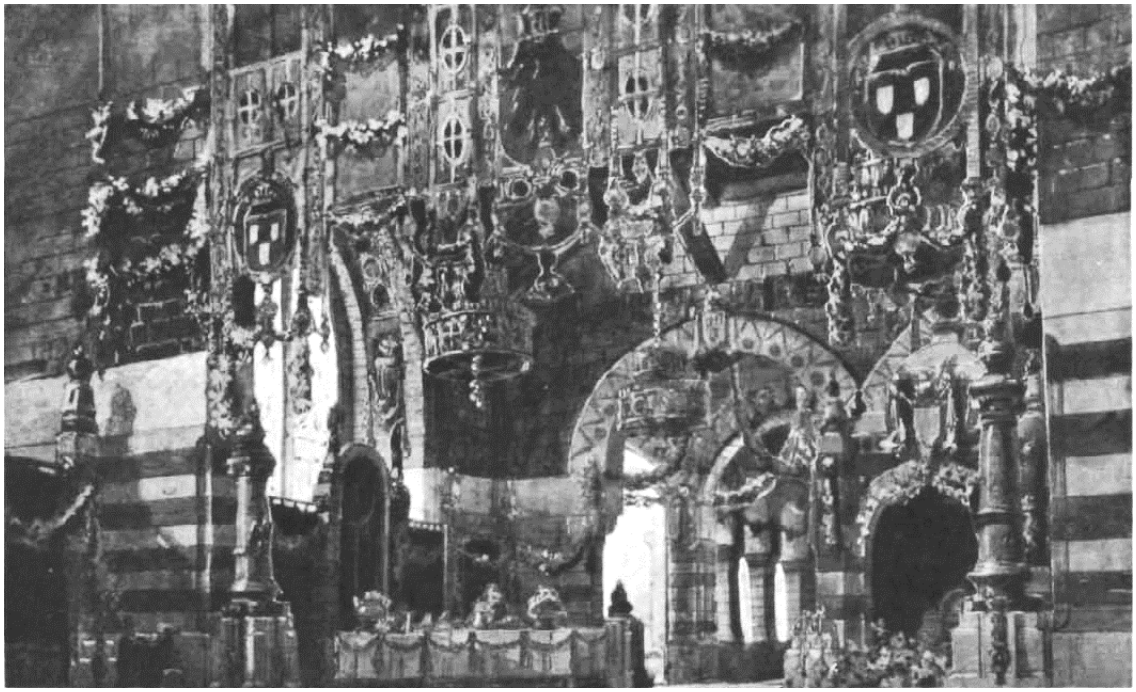
"Època llegendària"



"Primer acte

Quadro I: L'aparició

Sala del palau reial. Al fons, una ampla galeria amb arcades i columnes, que dona a un frondós jardí de vegetacions exòtiques. A mà dreta, al fons, un llarg corredor. Se celebra un banquet pel naixement d'una filla dels reis, la primera que han tingut ja en la vellesa. Una gran taula, parada amb sumptuosa vaixella i decorada amb flors, està ocupada per cortesans i per dames que riuen i parlen. Al mig, presidint el Rei i la Regina. A fora se sent també gran gatzara del poble, que expressa l'alegria amb cants i danses. Es veuran, al jardí, les parelles passar i traspassar pel fons de la galeria."

"La sala s'enfosqueix de sobte. Pel corredor del fons avança una forma blanca i lluminosa fins que desemboca en escena." "La fantasma se'n va dreta cap al bressol. Amb les dues ales del seu vel lluminós el cobreix i s'aboca damunt d'ell."

[59] Basada en la llegenda provençal de Perrault La belle au bois dormant.

"Mentre la música es va perdent en harmonies vagues i tremoloses, la fantasma es difumina poc a poc fins que desapareix. Els cortesans, quan reprenen el cor, cauen de genolls." "El Rei i la Regina han restat abraçats des que la Fada ha desaparegut. Cau la cortina pausadament."

“Quadre II: El mirall fatal

El jardí de palau. A mà dreta, un angle d’aquest amb una escala ampla i de poca altura que puja fins al llindar de la porta. Al fons, una gran espessor de tells i castanyers altíssims. A mà esquerra, un llac que es perd pel mateix costat. De temps en temps, hi passen nedant suaument cignes blanquíssims. Alguns salzes aboquen sobre les aigües dormides llurs brancatges esllanguits. Lo que resta d’escena, és cobert d’herba tendra, entapissada tota de flors brillants. Els rossinyols hi refilen.”

Il·lustració 192: Fotografia d’escena de l’acte 1, quadre 2. [La Ilustració catalana 206 (12/05/1907), p. 298; El arte del teatro *29 (01/06/1907), p. 12].

“En obrir-se les cortines, una colla de nois i noies entren amb gran xiscladiça en escena, sortint del jardí per la banda de darrera del palau. Miren tots enlaire com cercant quelcom entre les branques de l’arbreda. Entre ells hi va la Princessa, qui s’ha de distingir de tots els altres per una excepcional bellesa i la riquesa i el gust dels seus vestits.”

“Alguns nois s’enfilen pels arbres. Els altres, donant-se les mans, canten fent la sardana al voltant de la soca.” “La Princesa, seguida d’alguns nois i noies, va a la vora del llac en busca de la ploma. S’agenolla en terra i l’assoleix. Per compte d’alçar-se, resta de genolls, abocada a l’aigua com mirant el fons amb insistència. La dansa dels nois continua, mentre la Princesa resta immòbil en la mateixa posició.”

“Una veu des del cim dels arbres. La dansa s’interromp.” “Durant el diàleg de l’au i la Princesa, els nois i noies, presos tots de gran esglai, han anat fugint uns pel jardí, uns altres per la porta del palau. La Princesa, entre els acords misteriosos de l’orquestra, s’ajau suaument entre les flors, com presa d’un son dolcíssim. Entren precipitadament els Reis, seguits de Merlí i de dames i cavallers. Durant tota aquesta escena, els jardins s’han d’il·luminar amb clarors vagues i fantàstiques fins al final.”

Il·lustració 193*: Fotografia d'escena de l'acte 1, quadre 2. Jardí del palau, quan els nois i la princesa es troben amb el seguici reial. [*La hormiga de oro 19 (11/05/1907), p. 300.]

[El Rei a la Princesa] "Li agafa el cap entre les seves mans i el besa. La Regina i els demés proven de retornar-la." "Dames i cavallers surten tantost ho ha indicat el Rei i compareixen altre cop, entrant en escena per l'escala del palau, quan el Rei hagi acabat el seu parlament, portant el vestit i les garlandes. Les donzelles la vesteixen. Després, en un llit format per branques florides arrencades dels arbres, la conduiran a pes de braços al palau, seguides de tot el corteig. Durant aquesta escena els cors entonaran solemnialment aquest himne, que ha de tenir el caràcter de marxa fúnebre i ensems de marxa nupcial."

"Així que el cos de la Princesa ha traspassat el llindar de la porta del palau, apareix la Fada entre l'espessor del jardí. Moviment d'espant i sorpresa de tots els presents." "La Fada obre els braços, fent un gest vers l'estol dels guardians, patges i donzelles. De sobte, cauen tots sobre els graons de l'escala com presos d'una son invencible. Cortines lentes."

“Segon acte

Quadro I: 333 anys després...

Una esplanada davant d’un bosc. El bosc ombrívol, espès i d’arbres negres i turmentats s’estén des de mitja escena cap al fons, pujant pel vessant d’una muntanya molt espadada i esquerpa, en el cim de la qual s’hi veurà part d’un gran castell, cobert materialment per la verdor dels arbres gegants que el circumden, talment que només han d’emergir de dins l’espès fullam algunes cúpules i agulles de colors pàl·lids i somorts. El sol s’és post darrera el castell, voltant-lo d’una daurada i feble aurèola de posta tardorenca que il·lumina vagament tot el paisatge. El pastor i el rabadà estan asseguts davant d’un foc, vigilant el remat, que es suposarà pasturant a un dels costats invisibles de l’escena. El Rabadà toca en el flabiol un aire popular.”

“El vailet agafa una pedra i la llença contra el bosc com li ha dit el pastor. Tan bon punt la pedra toca les fulles, surt del fons del brancatge un acord dolcíssim de veus femenines, que va minvant d’intensitat gradualment.” “El rabadà agafa un grapat de pedres i les llença una darrera l’altre. A la primera es torna a sentir l’acord. Després a mida que va llençant les demés, els acords se succeeixen seguits, seguits, modulant suaument una màgica melodia de veus blanques.”

“Se senten, una mica distants, les trompes i els corns d’una cacera que es va acostant ràpidament. Al cap d’una estona compareixen corrent cavallers amb sagetes i ballestes.” “Arrenquen a córrer en direcció al bosc.” [El pastor] “Posant-se al davant dels cavallers.” “El Príncep, a cavall, ha entrat en escena durant l’anterior diàleg.”

“El Príncep avença resoltament, llençant-se en direcció al bosc. El cel s’ennuvola.” [Pastor] “Posant-se al davant.” [Príncep] “Apartant violentament el pastor.” “La tempesta esclata en llamps i trons. El Príncep s’arrenca en direcció al bosc. Quan és a vora les branques altíssimes i espesses dels arbres i de les mates, aquestes se separen per si mateixes com per fer-li pas. Tantost les toca, sonen els acords màgics, que es resolen en l’himne següent.”

“Quadre II: L’amor desperta la bellesa

Un interior de palau mig enrunat. En primer terme, una ampla graderia. Al replà superior una columnata, des d’on arrenca una escala portant a un templet cobert amb cortinatges pesants i sumptuosament brodats de brillants colors somorts pel temps. A mà dreta, una gran finestra mig ensorrada. A mà esquerra, una gran porta tancada. A un costat i altre del templet, damunt de l’escala i darrera les columnes, el mur de l’edifici es veu completament badat en algun tros. A través d’aquestes escletxes i obertures es veuen alguns indrets del jardí abandonat amb gran espessor d’herbes altíssimes i d’arbres seculars que oculten el cel quasi totalment i aboquen onades de fullatge a l’interior de la sala. Les heures i enredaderes del jardí també hi penetren, escampant en totes direccions llur brancam luxuriós, que s’entortolliga per les columnes, corona la volta del templet, s’enfila pels arbres i s’arrossega escales avall. Mil menes d’herbes i molses salvatges entapissen a trossos els graons i les columnes. Ajaguts els uns per les escales i els altres recolzats, de peu dret o asseguts, en les columnes, guerrers i guardians armats de totes armes, patges i donzelles, escampats tots en un bell desordre, dormen profundament en una absoluta immobilitat. Les cuirasses, els escuts i els cascos dels guerrers s'han de veure rovellats i plens de molsa. Les heures passen per damunt de molts dels dorments.

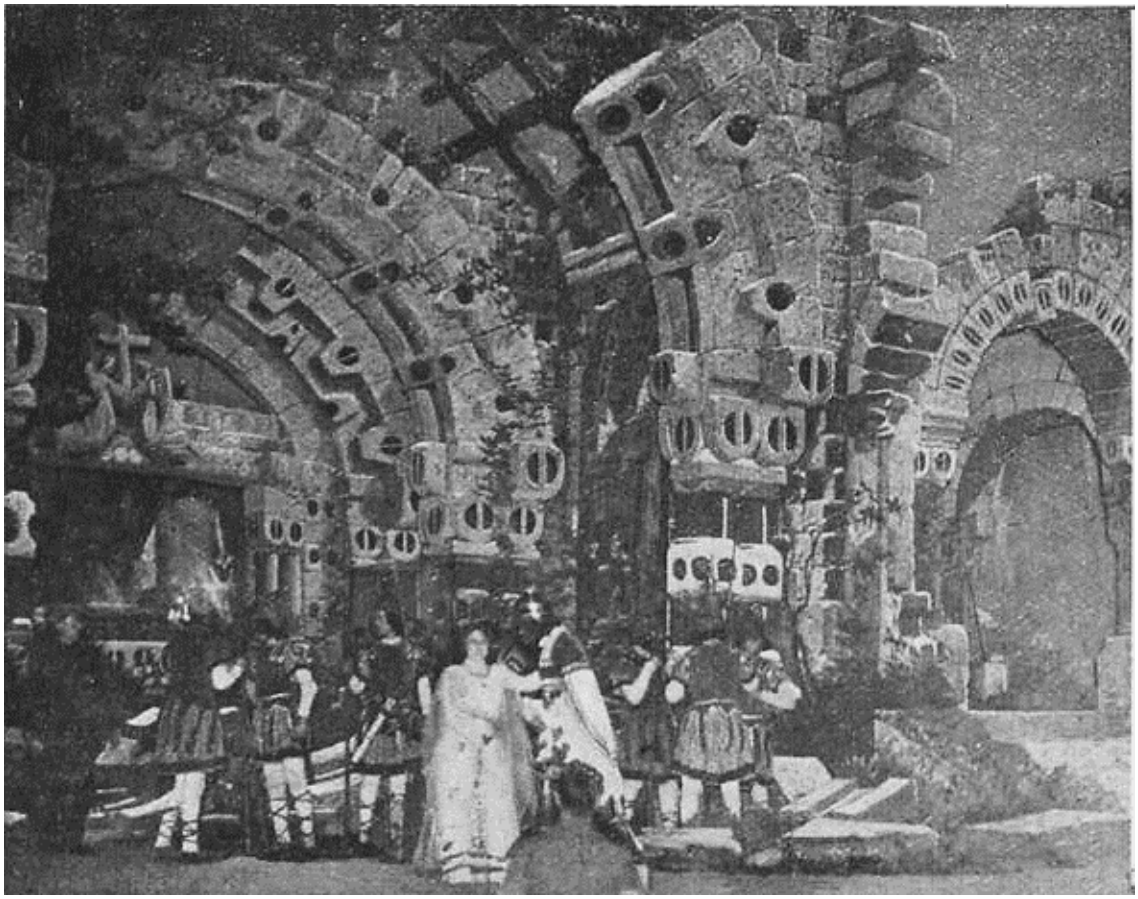
És primera hora de matinada i encara negra nit. El clar de lluna il·lumina fantàsticament els frondosos fullatges del jardí abandonat. Un raig suavíssim llisca per l'aire quiet de l'estança il·luminant-la vagament. Els ratpenats volen esquerps d'un cantó a l'altre i es gronxen sospesos en l'artesonat trossejat del sostre. Se sent xiular les òlibes i els mussols."



Il·lustració 194: *Escenografia del quadre 2 de l'acte 2 de La nina dormida al bosc. [*El arte del teatro 29 (01/06/1907), p. 12].

"En cantar les fades la segona o la tercera estrofa, apareix per encantament la Fada del palau a un dels angles de la sala. L'ombra lluminosa llisca suaument fins als peus de l'escala del templet, puja pels graons, aparta la cortina, mira endins, torna a baixar i roman immòbil al replà." "S'esvaeix."

"Se sent un cop terrible a la gran porta lateral, que cau feta estelles." "Apareix el Príncep amb brillant armadura. Mira un moment atònit al seu voltant. Avença després amb resolució, puja les escales i, sense dubtar, aparta d'un violent cop de mà les cortines del templet, que cauen a terra. Apareix l'interior del templet amb un sumptuós llit al mig, on jau dormida la Princesa abillada de núvia. A un costat, s'obra una gran escletxa que deixa veure les verdors del jardí. Un immens roser de bosc penetra a l'interior, estenent per damunt del llit el seu brancatge atapeït de roses blanques i rojes. Dos coloms blancs reposen immòbils en una branca del roser. El dia ha sortit."

[Príncep] “Abocant-se ansiós per damunt del llit.” “Li fa una llarga besada als ulls. Se sent a dintre la veu de la Fada.” “La Princesa a la fi obre els ulls, se redreça lleugerament en el seu llit, mira al voltant, reflexant el seu esguard l’estupor del qui ve de sortir d’un son profund. Fixa al fi els ulls en el cavaller.” “Els cavallers, els guardians, els patges i les donzelles que dormien escampats per les escales, tantost la Princesa ha obert els ulls, s’han anat despertant els uns darrera els altres, mirant estranyament al llur voltant, desemperesint-se, esguardant-se mútuament plens de sorpresa, fent durar aquest jos escènic fins arribar a les darreres paraules dels enamorats. En eix instant s’aixequen tots, agrupant-se amb regularitat a les escales. El Príncep i la Princesa, de peu dret i abraçats, romanen al replà.” “Entre les escletxes dels murs apareixen els cavallers companys de cacera del Príncep.”

"La nina dormida al bosc és el títol de la rondalla lírica de gran espectacle que s'estrenarà avui en el teatre Principal.

La lletra és d'en Manuel de Montoliu i la música del mestre Alfonso. Per a aquesta obra ha pintat quatre decoracions l'escenògraf senyor Castells."

"El estreno del cuento lírico en dos actos y cuatro cuadros, titulado: La nina dormida al bosc, que anteanoche tuvo lugar en el teatro Principal, no pudo ser más lisonjero para sus autores.

Hubo muchos aplausos, cada uno de los cuadros fue muy celebrado, y al final de los dos actos tuvieron que presentarse al público don Manuel de Montoliu, autor de la letra, y el de la música, don Federico Alfonso.

El asunto es un poema lírico en que se ve desarrollado con distinción, fruto de la cultura literaria del poeta, el lindo cuento que ha recreado durante siglos tantas imaginaciones infantiles, de la bella dormida en el bosque, a la que, después de trescientos años de profundo sueño, viene a despertar un gallardo príncipe, arrojado y despreciador del peligro, que llega hasta la princesa encantada abriéndose paso entre la maleza de espinas que protegen el sueño de la beldad, como Sigfrido a través del ardiente circulo de llamas que guardan al de la Walkyria.

El mérito primero del compositor que ha puesto en música este poético asunto ha sido el de haber sabido conservar el ambiente en que se desarrolla la acción, variable según los cuadros que se van sucediendo, pero con la unidad que les da el carácter legendario del asunto y de las figuras; es una región imaginaria y de fantasía, en la cual, tan real, o mejor dicho, tan poco real es la figura del Hada del Palacio, como la de los Reyes, Merlín y la Princesa encantada.

Como músico, el señor Alfonso va realizando cuanto permitían esperar sus laureadas obras anteriores; al lanzarse ahora, desde la composición coral a la visión teatral, o más bien a la ópera, pues la estrenada en el Principal es una verdadera ópera, lo ha hecho con una seguridad y un dominio de su arte, que engañarían al que no supiese que el músico está ahora en los comienzos de su carrera de compositor. La orquesta, llena y sonora, los coros, dentro de su sencillez, tan acertados, los cantos del Hada y de la Princesa, la declamación solemne del Rey, justificaban la opinión de los espectadores, que veían en la nueva obra una de las más completas de las que se han estrenado en la escena del Principal.

No estableceremos preferencias entre los cuatro cuadros: cada uno está igualmente acertado de expresión y de color. En el primero, los Reyes y su corte celebran un banquete solemnizando el nacimiento de la Princesa; anubla la alegría y esplendor del cuadro la aparición del hada que predice la desgracia de la Princesa, pero también su liberación.

En el cuadro segundo se realiza la primera parte de la predicción fatal: contemplando su hermosura en el cristal del estanque, queda encantada la Princesa, y con ella la corte entera, el castillo, jardines y servidores. Pasan trescientos años, y un nuevo cuadro nos lleva a los bosques que rodean la antigua y arruinada mansión, bosques frecuentados por las hadas, objeto de terror del pueblo; un Príncipe que oye hablar de la bella encantada, burlándose del peligro se lanza a su conquista, entre el fulgor del relámpago y el fragor del trueno. Se ha deshecho el encanto: a la presencia del caballero, la Princesa despierta de su largo sueño y cae en brazos de su libertador, concluyendo este cuarto cuadro con un dúo y un himno al amor, que ha sido poderoso para desvanecer y conjurar el hechizo.

Este final es de mucho efecto, aunque en parte haya más bien que adivinarse, pues la amplitud que le ha dado el músico supera a las fuerzas y a la buena voluntad de los ejecutantes.

El señor Alfonso, que dirigió él mismo su obra, fue objeto de repetidas llamadas a escena y entusiastas aplausos. También los obtuvieron las decoraciones pintadas para esta obra por el señor Castells, un escenógrafo joven igualmente, pero que ha demostrado en la concepción y ejecución de estos cuadros alientos e inventiva. “La nina dormida al bosc, rondalla escènica d’espectacle en dos actes i quatre quadros, que s’estrenà la vetlla del 27 del present mes, meresqué del públic excel·lent acolliment. Són autors d’ella el distingit poeta en Manuel de Montoliu i el llorejat compositor en Frederic Alfonso. Ambdós són joves i, per lo tant, ardits i confiats, lo qual equival a garantia segura de l’èxit, que no ha fallat pas en el moment decisiu. La nina dormida al bosc és una de les obres més completes i rodones que s’han vist en aquell escenari durant la present temporada; llibre i música s’enllacen amb perfeta consonància i proporcionen a l’espectador intens goig de l’esperit.

La manca d’espai ens priva d’estendre’ns com voldríem sobre la inspirada partitura del mestre Alfonso. Les mateixes qualitats de tècnica ferma, vibrant sentiment i distinció melòdica que en les obres corals d’aquest autor havíem ja apreciat abans, les trobem novament en sa darrera producció teatral, valorades més encara pel treball instrumental que denota una intuïció dramàtica de primera força en la manera de tractar i combinar les diferents sonoritats de l’orquestra. El caràcter distintiu de cada un dels quadros se troba, ademés, feliçment interpretat pel sentiment íntim de la música que l’acompanya, la qual ofereix contrastos abundosos que presten a l’obra vida intensa i atractiu creixent.

És, en resum, una obra seriosa i sincera que ha de guanyar sentida en successives audicions; treballada a consciència, i acusant ja en diferents indrets la personalitat artística de l’autor.

La bona presentació escènica de la poètica rondalla, amb un decorat molt ensopegat i vistós, degut al senyor Castells, ajuda força a l'excel·lent efecte que, en general, ha produït al públic.

El senyor Alfonso, que dirigí l'orquestra en les primeres representacions, va ésser cridat a l'escena junt amb el senyor Montoliu a l'acabament de cada acte."

"No trobo res més per a parlar que La nina dormida al bosc, estrenada a can Graner el dissabte al vespre. És una rondalla, saben? I figura una noia que està dormida 333'33 anys perquè ho volen així en Montoliu i una fada. Però en Santpere, que fa de príncep, s'entera de la cosa i quan la noia ha dormit els 333'33 anys, diu: «Vaja, prou!» I entra al castell encantat i enrunat on dorm la nina. Però quan hi és i veu l'indret on la nina es troba, pensa: «Això d'anar-te'n hi de dret, no fa gaire guerrero». I ell que dona una volta amb el sol fi de provar que és un guerrero com una casa, enfonsant una porta d'un cop de puny. Jo mai ho hauria dit, que pogués fer semblants estragos aquest Santpere. El cas és que la nina es desperta i canten un rengle i la fada se les ha d'espinyar.

Ara no es pensin que això sigui tota l'obra. No. Abans hi ha el quadro del bateig de la nina, amb uns balls de altres nines, vestides de guerrero, que resulten d'allò més; acabat aquell quadro en ve un altre amb la nina ja grandeta, que s'adorm. I després, entre el segon quadro del primer acte i el primer del segon, passen els 333'33 anys i ens trobem en un bosc —el bosc de la nina— amb uns pastors que parlen dels embruixaments. I per últim ve lo que ja els he explicat d'en Santpere, que troba la nina del bosc.

I tot això va barrejat amb cants i ballarugues i paleges d'altres nines i altres fades i altres guerreros, que evolucionen en mig d'uns decorats molt vistosos i compostos amb gran traça per l'escenògraf Castells, que ha demostrat saber-ne quatre nius: un per decoració. I els versos que canten i diuen tota aquella gent, són escrits per en Manel de Montoliu amb força inspiració i musicats pel mestre Alfonso amb molta sabiduria i molt sabor popular i molt bon aire.

En fi, cavallers, que un hi passa la estona veient La nina dormida al bosc. [...]

"Crónicas menudes

Puestos a llevar a la escena las tradiciones populares, no podía ni debía librarse de ello la suave leyenda de la bella princesa que duerme por artes de encantamiento durante siglos y a la que el Amor, pasando con galas de príncipe prendado de su belleza, despierta con un beso en los cerrados ojos. Oí yo por primera vez este maravilloso cuento al amor de la lumbre encendida contra las brumas trías del Norte y de los rudos labios de mi niñera, que era, para servir a ustedes, una bilbaína como de dos metros de estatura y ancha a proporción, como ya no se llevan en parte alguna. Y a pesar de los años ¡ay! Pasados —porque, según mis cálculos, debió de ser esto poco después de la invasión de los cartagineses— queda la memoria de aquella noche como un vago girón de niebla que aventa y deshilacha la tempestad del largo vivir. Murió mi niñera, porque también las niñeras se mueren más tarde o más temprano, y andando los días ha venido a referirme nuevamente la dulce leyenda de la princesita dormida el joven Montoliu, con música del maestro Alfonso, decorado de Castells y fondos facilitados por el infatigable y, al parecer, inagotable Graner.

El aderezo que ha hecho el joven Montoliu de la leyenda con el título, un poco impropio, de La nina dormida al bosc, me ha gustado un poco menos que el que le daba mi niñera destrozando el castellano hasta un extremo que habría sido grato a Puig i Cadafalch […].

He de contentarme con la princesa que nos ha servido Montoliu con algo más de fortuna que aquella Donzella qui va a la guerra del año pasado, que era, y el Señor me perdone, la más grande simpleza que he conocido. Si todo lo que pasa en La nina dormida al bosc se tuviera tan firme como lo que sucede en el primer cuadro dentro del palacio reial, ya podríamos darnos con un canto en el pecho de Montoliu; pero el interés no se sostiene luego suficientemente por cierta vaguedad en el desarrollo de la leyenda, que resulta un tanto incomprensible. Si el joven Montoliu me da unas tijeras y el ejemplar de La nina corto de modo que dejo aquello como las propias rosas, Y aun haré más, para que se vea mi buena voluntad: déme Montoliu solamente el ejemplar y yo pondré las tijeras, que por ayudar a Graner soy capaz de cualquier razonable sacrificio. Medítese y, si se acepta, en casa estoy de seis a ocho y en la Aduana durante el día preguntando al carabinero que hay en la puerta, al cual ya tengo amaestrado para recibir militarmente a los que van a buscarme con comedias, dramas y demás explosivos.

Hechos los necesarios cortes en la letra, llamaría aparte al maestro Alfonso y con la confianza de tocayo le diría que, habiendo en él, como yo creo que hay, un músico de cuerpo entero que sabe lo que lleva entre manos —como lo prueba toda la segunda y deliciosa mitad del primer cuadro—, debería sacrificar algunas notas que alargan y hasta suspenden la acción con perjuicio del interés, como ocurre al presentarse el príncipe y ver a la princesa dormida, o cuando un poco antes salen aquellas apreciables bailarinas danzando inoportunamente sobre las ruinas del palacio reial, aunque la música es muy bonita. Pero, querido tocayo, cada cosa a su tiempo, y la ocasión de aquel baile puede ser en una apoteosis final, pero no antes, y usted perdone que me meta en pentágramas de once varas; pero, ya sabe usted, este sagrado sacerdocio... etc.

Sé por una de las brujas de La santa espina —que para eso es bruja y chismosa— que a los cómicos no les gustaba esta Nina, y en verdad que ya se conoció sobradamente. Los versos de Montoliu no son una maravilla; pero, caramba, amigos, parecían peores por lo mal que los dijeron ustedes, al extremo de que, a excepción de Puiggarí, no podía saberse si lo que decían los demás eran endecasílabos o un manifiesto electoral. Y el endecasílabo ¡porra! tiene su cadencia, señores, y es un verso altamente respetable que hay que decir con las debidas cesuras que no perjudican al prosodismo. Y conste que en esta censura no incluyo a Tor, Balot, Morató y Riu porque no dicen esta boca es mía, limitándose a llevar a cuestas a la señorita Morató en clase de nina. Tan brillante papel fue dignamente desempeñado; pero, poniéndose en todo, hay que decir que, si a mí me entregan a la señorita Morató, y dormida por añadidura, no me quito de comparsa en mucho tiempo y la llevo de acá para allá como la más dulce carga de la vida, lo juro por estas cruces.

Y juro asimismo que el escenógrafo Castells ha acertado en todo el decorado —aparte su tendencia a subrayar los colores vivos—, excepción hecha de la última decoración, que representa el castillo arruinado. Si se tratara de otro escenógrafo nada diría; pero no es admisible que uno que se llama Castells no disponga entre los que forman su apellido de un castell mejor pintado, aunque esté más arruinado que Girona pobre. Y al llegar a este punto permítaseme comunicar al respetable público un milagro mucho más estupendo que los del beato Oriol: allí, en aquel castillo arruinado, todo ha caído bajo el peso de tres siglos, las piedras sillares, las vigas fortísimas, los duros hierros; pero ha resistido heroicamente una rica cortina de cáñamo que oculta a la princesa. Este prodigio, que habla muy alto en pro de la bondad de la industria textil catalana, me dejó absorto y causará seguramente impresión en mis contemporáneos.

Por este detalle vendrán ustedes en conocimiento del descuido y falta de tino con que esta obra ha sido «puesta» en escena, si no bastara la detestable colocación de las figuras en el final del segundo cuadro y comienzos del último. Y es lamentable, porque con todo y los defectos apuntados —y otros que me callo por no moler—, La nina dormida al bosc merece verse por la esplendidez de la presentación, en la que Graner no ha escatimado nada, por casi toda la música del maestro Alfonso, y en parte por el buen deseo con que Montoliu ha dramatizado la leyenda popular. Y es, como dicen en Andalucía, un «contra-Dios» que dando generosamente el esfuerzo para lo más se descuide para lo menos, si puede llamarse menos a la labor espinosa y difícil de «poner» las obras como los cánones ordenan.

No hay nada sobre un escenario, amigo Graner, tan peligroso como la dirección de muchos. Con uno bueno basta, y para otra vez, si hay que echar una mano, aquí estoy yo a disposición de las Empresas a razón de dos pesetas por hora, casi tan económico como las interinas que fan feines.

Hay que agarrarse a lo que salga, que no están los tiempos para andarse con remilgos.

"S'ha estrenat darrerament i amb un èxit de aquells que els castellans en diuen lisonjero, una obreta lírica que porta per títol La nina dormida al bosc.

Una antiga llegenda molt innocentona ha donat peu al Sr. Montoliu per a engiponar algunes escenes poètiques que tenen quant menos el mèrit de ser ben escrites. Això justifica el que l'obra en conjunt, si no arriba a interessar, s'escolti amb gust.

Les il·lustracions musicals són sense dubte lo millor del llibre. El Sr. Alfonso ha tret un gran partit de les situacions, demostrant en la majoria dels números una traça i una inspiració dignes de millor causa.

De les decoracions no val la pena parlar-ne: n'havem vist de més bones... i de més dolentes.

Els intèrprets hi varen fer lo que bonament sabien."

"En Barcelona ha tenido un buen éxito la obra de un valenciano, hijo de un periodista distinguido y amigo nuestro: D. Francisco Alfonso. Su hijo, D. Federico, que comenzó sus estudios en el Conservatorio de Valencia, ha hecho la música para un cuento lírico de los que se representan en el teatro Principal de Barcelona. El asunto es la conocida leyenda de La niña dormida en el bosque.

[…] El Sr. Alfonso, que dirigió él mismo su obra, fue objeto de repetidas llamadas a escena y entusiastas aplausos. Reciba nuestros plácemes."

"Continúan con éxito creciente en este teatro las representaciones del cuento lírico en dos actos La nina dormida al bosc, singularmente para el músico D. Federico Alfonso.

Ya se puede dar el título de maestro al que ayer fue un distinguido aficionado, vencedor en varios certámenes musicales, en cuyos modestos trabajos se adivinaba al compositor de mañana, como su valiosa labor actual revela, un compositor de vuelos para el porvenir.

El cuadro que encierra este poemita del Sr. Montoliu, pequeño para el músico, cuyas alas pugnan aprisionadamente en estrecho marco.

El principal mérito del compositor es atemperarse estéticamente a la simplicidad del cuento y a sus dimensiones.

En los diversos números de música patentiza el Sr. Alfonso un vasto conocimiento de los diversos estilos musicales, singularmente para el género moderno por el cual siente singular predilección, para cuyo cultivo además de un profundo conocimiento técnico, sane escribir con facilidad y elegancia.

Hemos dicho que el éxito del músico va en creciente porque su labor más se aprecia cuanto más se la conoce.

Felicitamos al novel maestro a quien aguardamos en sucesivas obras de mayor importancia en el asunto, las que seguramente no se harán esperar."

"No separant-se de la llegenda, els autors han procurat fer una obra de espectacle, pròpia per a les Audicions Graner, i, tenint en compte aquest objecte, podem dir que n'han sortit molt airosos, tant el poeta com el músic.

L'assumpte és senzill, però captiva. A l'aixecar-se el teló ens trobem en un palau reial, a on s'hi està celebrant el naixement d'una princeseta (la nina). L'alegria és gran; brinda el Rei, corejat per dames i cavallers i el cant del poble [...]

Mes el Rei té una pena i un vell oracle li anuncia que la princesa, [...] restaria immòbil i encisada [...]

L'adiví Merlí, que està present, li corrobora tal pesar, mes, per provar si hi ha remei, invoca á la fada encisera, qui es presenta en escena en mig d'un gran esglai per part de tots els comensals. El fantasma va dret cap al bressol de la princeseta i li canta [...]

Amb lo descrit n'hi ha prou perquè el lector se faci càrrec de l'argument que motiva la presentació dels quatre quadros, que estan tots descrits amb una poesia delicada, quals versos són acompanyats d'una música bastant sentida i molt adequada a la situació.

Durant els tres quadros restants se compleix tot lo que es profetitza en el primer, mes no volem deixar de copiar uns quants versos, descripció que fa un pastor als cavallers i al Princep, quins volen assaltar el castell enrunat. [...]

En Montoliu és un poeta.

Ha decorat l'obra el jove pintor Sr. Castells, qui va deixar-nos apreciar bons detalls d'escenografia en ses quatre vistoses decoracions que foren aplaudides i celebrades pel públic.

En l'execució van portar-se bé tots els artistes. La comparseria no va penetrar l'obra. Van distingir-se, fent-se dignes de l'aplauso, els Srs. Puiggener, Santpere, Puiggarí, Giralt, i les Sres. Morató, Paricio i Ferràndiz.

En resum: una obra que donarà entrades al vell teatre de Santa Creu."

La Escena catalana 31 (04/05/1907), pp. 3–4.

"[...] La rondalla en què es basa l'obra és prou coneguda per a que ens puguem estalviar d'explicar-la. N'hi ha prou amb dir que en Montoliu l'ha dialogada en versos correctes i fluïts, que són encant de l'oït per la seva musicalitat i del seny per la seva construcció. A més, ha tallat l'acció en quatre quadros, presentats per l'empresa amb gran riquesa de vestuari i decorat.

El mestre Alfonso ha posat música a l'obra, sortint-se'n ben airosament. El to popular hi vibra sempre, enlairant-se a voltes en ales de la inspiració; els corals són ben matisats i l'orquestra sona plena.

En quant al decorat, diferent en tots quatre quadros, ha estat construït pel jove escenògraf senyor Castells, que ha demostrat excel·lents condicions. Té aquest artista bon gust en la distribució dels termes, riquesa en el colorit i traça per a donar valor a tots els detalls. La decoració de bosc amb què comença el segon acte, és en aquest concepte de les bones que es veuen. [...]

"Este cuento lírico en dos actos y cuatro cuadros, puesto en escena en el teatro Principal, ocupará lugar preferente en la serie numerosa de grandes éxitos logrados por el notable artista Sr. Graner, a cuyo cargo están la empresa y la dirección del decano de nuestros coliseos y que con sus espectáculos audiciones viene realizando una obra de cultura altamente meritoria.

El asunto del cuento es bien conocido. […]

Tan poético tema ha sido hermosamente tratado por el señor Montoliu; el libro, por este escrito en bellísimos versos, tiene toda la delicadeza y toda la ingenuidad de los cuentos infantiles, y así la acción como la forma producen en el ánimo del espectador una sucesión no interrumpida de dulces e inefables sensaciones.

La música, del Sr. Alfonso, adáptase admirablemente a las diversas situaciones creadas por el poeta, y en medio de su rica variedad conserva siempre esa pureza, esa frescura que tan bien armonizan con el carácter del libro; es una partitura no solo inspiradísima, sino además perfectamente instrumentada, una ópera en la verdadera acepción de la palabra.

El poeta y el compositor, compenetrados de unos mismos sentimientos, han sabido llegar al alma del público, sin apelar a otros recursos que a la sinceridad y a la espontaneidad, cualidades primordiales de toda manifestación de arte y de poesía.

La parte escenográfica corresponde dignamente a la belleza del libro y de la música: las decoraciones del Sr. Castells son de un efecto sorprendente por su originalidad, por su entonación y por su riqueza.

Para todos ha sido un triunfo La nina dormida al bosc, a todos felicita sinceramente y con entusiasmo La Ilustración artística.

“La nina dormida al bosc

Así se titula un cuento escénico de espectáculo en dos actos y cuatro cuadros, letra de Montoliu, música de Alfonso, que acaba de estrenarse en el teatro Principal formando parte de los Espectáculos-Audiciones Graner que tan favorecidos vienen siendo por el público escogido y sano de Barcelona.

La nina dormida al bosc fúndase en la vieja leyenda de la Belle au bois dormant. Entre los actos primero y segundo transcurren 333 años... La princesa hechizada por suerte fatal recobra al cabo de siglos su primitivo ser y prorrumpe en palabras de amor. Alfonso, el laureado compositor, ha compuesto una música que ha sido muy elogiada por la prensa.

El escenógrafo Castells ha pintado unas decoraciones de gran efecto, vivas de colorido y llenas de imaginación. La presentación escénica es suntuosa; un nuevo triunfo para el popular pintor-empresario, para Luis Graner.”

La hormiga de oro 19 (11/05/1907), p. 299.

“El teatro lírico catalán se ha enriquecido con otra hermosa producción: de una sencillez poética, encantadora, el libro; de inspirados fragmentos, la música, y de una presentación escénica admirable por parte del decorado. Y esta obra, original de tres jóvenes artistas, perpetuará en los anales del teatro catalán el triunfo de la juventud, el talento indiscutible de Montoliu. Alfonso y Castells.

En la leyenda provenzal de Perrault La belle au bois dormant se ha inspirado el joven autor para escribir una poética visión musical intitulada La nina dormida al bosc. El argumento, sumamente delicado, nos recuerda aquellos cuentos de fantásticas hadas que cuando niños nos susurran a los oídos nuestras cariñosas madres para satisfacer nuestros candorosos anhelos de conocer aventuras caballerescas, historias de princesas encantadas y cuentos de sortilegios y brujerías.

Es indispensable poseer un temperamento de artista para llevar a cabo con fortuna empeños tan difíciles. Escrito el libro en correcto verso, es un bello poema donde el alma poética de Manuel de Montoliu se revela con todas sus exquisiteces de inspiración y arte.

La acción escénica se va desarrollando tranquilamente, y aunque recargada de ciertos efectismos que son de perdonar, no deja de hacerse interesante. Una linda princesita, hija de un poderoso rey, está predestinada, según el oráculo, a sumirse en dulce sueno, del que no ha de despertar nunca.

Todos los adivinos del reino están de acuerdo; pero junto a la cuna de la egregia niña, una hermosa hada murmura dulcemente su destino; corrobora los asertos de oráculos y adivinos, pero afirma que despertará del sueño cuando un caballero valiente y enamorado bese el inanimado cuerpo de la gentil princesa. El amor ha de darle de nueva la vida.

El amor es tu esperanza.
Si algún día, enamorado, un galán junto a ti avanza, al contacto de su lanza
tu sueño habrá terminado.

Son las palabras de aquella hada, palabras que tranquilizan algo al rey, que está apesadumbrado por la terrible profecía.

Esta se cumple: la bella princesa, sus damas, nobles y escuderos que la acompañan en feliz paseo se adormecen junto a las orillas de un delicioso lago, donde contempla la hermosa niña su divina imagen, que se esfuma entre las suaves ondulaciones de aquellas límpidas aguas.

Duerme la princesita; el encantamiento dura años y años, más de trescientos; el castillo donde está albergada vase derrumbando lentamente; pero he aquí que un apuesto cazador llega al bosque donde se elevan las ruinas del castillo encantado, y conocedor de la historia de la princesa dormida, que le narra un pastor, se decide a despertarla; y arrostrando peligros, abriéndose paso entre la maleza, derribando puertas, llega al salón donde dormita la encantadora niña, y con amoroso beso vence a las hadas, rompe el encantamiento y despierta la princesa, sus damas, nobles y escuderos.

Sencillo, encantador, el infantil cuento ha sido llevado a la escena con maestría que le hace interesante. Este es el sencillo, casi infantil argumento de la visión musical, para la que ha escrito el maestro Alfonso una hermosa partitura, pictórica de conocimientos técnicos y sutil inspiración.

La música de La nina dormida al bosc encajaría perfectamente en obra de más transcendencia e importancia que la delicada leyenda, escrita sin ampulosidades ni pretensiones de ninguna clase.

Los cantos del hada, de la princesa y el dúo final de la obra son fragmentos de mérito dignos de un gran maestro, por lo inspirados y su brillante instrumentación.

La obra ha sido acogida por el público con visibles muestras de agrado y complacencia. El éxito ha sido franco y sincero, contribuyendo no poco las cuatro magníficas decoraciones que ha pintado Castells, ricas en colorido y exuberantes de propiedad y sabor de época.

En todo el decorado ha evidenciado el joven escenógrafo profundos conocimientos en su arte, fruto de un largo y aprovechado estudio, dotándolas de cautivadora esplendidez, especialmente la del jardín del segundo cuadro del primer acto y el bosque del segundo acto, así como el castillo.

Castells ha poetizado delicadamente la acción de la leyenda. Su triunfo ha sido grande, y bien puede asegurarse que por sus alientos y talento es de los que han de figurar muy pronto entre los maestros y eminencias del arte escenográfico.

La interpretación irreprochable por parte de todos los actores de la casa, entre los que recordamos a las Srtas. Morató, Ferrándiz, Sra. Morera, y los señores Santpere y Puiggarí.

La dirección escénica, a cargo de Modest Urgell, muy acertada, y la orquesta bien dirigida por el maestro Lambert.

"El Álbum Salón, como en otras ocasiones lo ha hecho, se honra hoy publicando el retrato del fecundo e inspirado maestro compositor don Federico Alfonso, con motivo del triunfo indiscutible y grandioso que alcanzó con su ópera —de tal se puede conceptuar— en dos actos y cuatro cuadros, titulada: La nina dormida al bosc, estrenada la noche del 27 de abril en el teatro Principal de esta ciudad. Con rara unanimidad, toda la prensa ha reconocido y proclamado que la partitura que nos ocupa coloca a su autor al nivel de nuestros primeros maestros compositores.

El maestro Alfonso, que en cuantos certámenes ha tomado parte conquistó los más codiciados galardones y que en la Fiesta de la Música Catalana instituida por el Orfeó Cátala de 1896 obtuvo la Flor Natural —alta distinción que se otorgó por primera vez— por su inspirada y grandiosa obra A les estrelles, coro mixto a doce voces reales; en partitura ha patentizado en La nina dormida al bosc ser un técnico de primer orden, un compositor de inspiración y que domina el arte de instrumentar sin recurrir a fórmulas gastadas y dando a su trabajo un sello propio y moderno.

Para que no parezca apasionado el juicio del Álbum Salón, reproducimos algunos párrafos de las reseñas críticas de importantes publicaciones.

Del Diario de Barcelona: [119 (29/04/1907), pp. 4994–4995.]

El Noticiero Universal:

«El señor Montoliu ha sabido combinar con acierto algunas situaciones que ofrecen al músico ancho campo para mostrar la inspiración, y de ellas se ha aprovechado el joven compositor señor Alfonso para consolidar el buen nombre adquirido en los certámenes de la Música Catalana. El maestro ha conseguido su propósito y a él, más que al libretista y al escenógrafo, se debe que el público prestase atención a la nueva obra y la recibiese con unánime aplauso.

El señor Alfonso ha escrito bellísimas páginas en La nina dormida al bosc: se ha identificado con el espíritu y el carácter de la leyenda y ha interpretado los pasajes de la misma fielmente, con sinceridad de artista que no busca el aplauso en los efectos de relumbrón.

Original e inspirado en los temas melódicos, que señalan las diferentes situaciones y marcan los distintos caracteres de los personajes, conocedor de la técnica musical, ha armonizado los efectos orquestales con las voces, sin disonancias ni exageraciones. Los principales motivos son claros y están desarrollados en las debidas proporciones. La instrumentación, en general, es robusta, firme, pero tiene todos los suaves contrastes que demanda cada escena.

La composición musical del maestro Alfonso merece oírse más de una vez, para aquilatar su mérito; pero, desde un principio, revela a un músico nada vulgar y que, indudablemente, llegará a adquirir personalidad propia. Sobre todo, el cuadro primero de La nina dormida al bosc es, por sí solo, un poema musical desarrollado con todo el conocimiento del género. Son de irreprochable factura el bailable con que comienza y el raconto del Rey. En el segundo acto puede señalarse como notable el fragmento descriptivo de la tempestad.

Pero, repetimos, el triunfo legítimo es el obtenido por el músico. »

Terminamos asociándonos a los elogios tributados al maestro Alfonso, a la vez que agradeciéndole su atención para con el Álbum Salón permitiendo que publique en este número uno de los más hermosos fragmentos de La nina dormida al bosc[60].

Mucho celebramos los extraordinarios adelantos de que ha dado una nueva muestra y le auguramos un brillante porvenir en el arte que cultiva."

"El 27 del propio mes se estrenó La nina dormida al bosc, en dos actos y cuatro cuadros, letra de D. Manuel de Montoliu, música del maestro D. Federico Alfonso y decorado del joven pintor escenógrafo D. José Castells. Pocos éxitos se registran tan francos y entusiastas, coincidiendo en esta apreciación todos los periódicos, haciendo de la partitura los más vivos elogios.
La obra se representó hasta el final de temporada, alcanzando el número 33 las representaciones."

Acotacions i fotografies d'escena:

"Any 1900

[...] Un taller en el quint pis d'una casa dels barris de Sant Pau. Trastos de pintor a la dreta. Trastos d'escultor a l'esquerra, escampats per terra, i damunt dels tamborets i cadires de boga. A la dreta, a la paret del fondo, un quadro començat, a on s'hi vegi una dona nua, com si diguéssim una fada.

A la dreta, damunt d'un cavallet de pintor, un altre quadro començat: és el retrato de don Francisco. Enganxat a la tela amb una xinxeta, un retrato fotografia del mateix senyor. A la dreta, tocant a la paret del fondo, un sofà atrotinat.

A l'esquerra, damunt d'un cavallet d'escultor, un busto de vella dormint, tapat amb draps mullats: al peu del cavallet, una tarima petita i, un xic més enllà, un altre cavallet. A l'esquerra, tocant a la paret lateral, un armari amb prestatges i, dins de l'armari, llibres, i damunt de l'armari, dues escultures.

Gran escampall a dreta i esquerra de tota mena d'eines de pintor i escultor: carteres, esponges, colors, paletes, fanc, teles, palillos, etc., etc. En un racó, una xemeneia escalfa panxes. Llum zenital per medi de claraboia, amb cortina que estarà recollida a un costat.

A la dreta, dues finestres, amb cortines fosques recollides a un costat, que donen al carrer. Una cadira al peu d'una finestra d'aquestes.

A l'esquerra, una finestra que dona al cel-obert del pou. Una galleda al peu d'aquesta finestra i una tovallola estesa a la barana.

Al fondo, una porta amb una cortina portière recollida a un costat i lligada al mig amb una beta, que donarà al recibidor petit, a on hi haurà un penja-robes. Al fondo del recibidoret, una porta, que donarà a l'escala, oberta de bat a bat. S'ha de veure el replà i la barana. Al fondo del replà, la paret de l'escala.

I. Carlets i de seguida Rosa

En Carlets està ajagut al sofà i la Rosa, quan arriba, es queda un instant a la porta: a l'aixecar-se el teló, en Carlets estarà acabant de cantar la tercera copla de la següent cançó, que haurà començat sent el teló abaixat. La Rosa parla quan ell para de cantar.

[...] [Rosa] (vol dir el retrato i l'assenyala) [...] [Carlets] (Se gira les butxaques del revés: són buides).

II. Carlets, Rosa i Paulina

La Paulina fa mitja sempre. Quan va per a cantar, la plega i se la fica a la butxaca, i quan ha acabat de cantar, torna a fer mitja. Per a treure aigua del pou, fa el mateix joc amb la mitja.

[...] [Carlets] (Fa la posa de la fada del quadro) [...] (Cercant pinzells i paleta) [...] (Se senten els ceguets que toquen al carrer). (Transició) [Rosa] (Corrent, alegre, cap a la finestra) [Carlets] (Deixa paleta i pinzell) [...] (Corrent cap a la finestra i posant-se al costat de la Rosa) [...] Rosa i Carlets (cantant la cançó que toquen els ceguets) [...] (Aplaudint-se ells mateixos) [Carlets] (Agafa un tros de paper i amb un llapis hi posa la seva firma) [...] (Com si enraonés amb els ceguets i tirant-los el paper) [...]

[Rosa] (Pregant) [...] [Paulina] (Canta) [...] [Rosa] (Picant de mans) [...] (Se sent la veu d'en Ramiro, que canta el refrà de la cançó 1ª) [...] [Rosa] (Se'n va corrents i a l'arribar a la porta, torna enrere i, encarant-se amb en Carlets, li diu) [...]

III. Rosa, Carlets, Paulina i Ramiro. A l'entrar en Ramiro, ensopega amb la Rosa que surt.

[...] [Carlets] (sense fer-li gaire cas i començant a preparar pinzells i paleta) [...] [Ramiro] (destapa el busto) [...] [Carlets] (arregla trastos i colors, sense fer gaire cas d'en Ramiro) [...] (Agafa el retrato que era al cavallet i el posa en un racó, de cara a la paret) [...] (Quan en Ramiro és escales avall, en Carlets surt al replà i el crida) [...]

IV. Carlets, de seguida don Francisco

En Carlets arregla les cortines per a tenir llum a propòsit, agafa paleta i pinzells i es posa a treballar davant del retrato que haurà tornat al cavallet. Canta les tres darreres coples de la cançó de taller. Música. Passaran minyones que van a estendre roba al terrat i es veurà com obren la porta. Don Francisco, quan arriba al replà, s'atura a esbufegar una estona: quan para la música entra dient: [...]

[Carlets] (Girant-se a mirar-lo i tornant-se cerimoniós) [...] [Francisco] (Mira el retrato) [...] (Traient-se els diners de la butxaca, comptant-los i donant-li dos duros i quatre pessetes) [...] Carlets (ficant-se els diners a la butxaca) [...] (Treu un tros de paper ben gran d'una cartera i amb llapis hi escriu el recibet. Al donar-lo a don Francisco li diu) [...]

V. Carlets, don Francisco, Paulina

Francisco (A Paulina, girant-se de cara a ella i d'espatlles a en Carlets) [...] Carlets (Senyalant, sense que don Francisco el vegi, el retrato que ell fa) [...]

VI. Carlets i Paulina

Carlets (cantant) [...] (Para de cantar, agafa el barret i diu) [...] (Se'n va cap a rentar-se les mans a la galleda i la troba buida) [...] (Traient-se els diners de la butxaca i mirant-se un duro) [...] (Se'n va cantant la tornada de la cançó primera).

VII. Paulina i Maria

La Paulina plega la mitja i tira una galleda d'aigua. Després torna a treure la mitja i va a assentar-se al costat de la finestra: s'adorm. L'orquestra mentrestant tocarà el motiu de la Maria, que serà el mateix amb què acabarà l'obra.

Poc abans d'acabar l'orquestra, apareix Maria, que puja l'escala. La primera pregunta la fa des del replà; la segona, des del recibidor. [...]

Maria (guaitant tot el taller) [...] (S'atura davant del quadro començat i penjat de la paret) [...] (Guaitant cap a l'escala i escoltant) [...] Paulina (va fins al replà i torna dient) [...]

VIII. Paulina, Maria i Rosa

[...] (La Paulina, fent mitja, se'n va a seure al costat de la finestra; acaba per adormir-se) [...] (Rosa fa senyal que no movent el cap) [...] [Durant el monòleg de la Rosa, (música a l'orquestra)] [...] (Pausa. La Rosa i la Maria ploren. La Paulina dorm)

IX. Paulina, Maria, Rosa i Lluís

En Lluís arriba carregat amb un cavallet d'escultor, una caixa amb barretes de cera, un paquet de palillos i esponges i un pot de llauna. A l'entrar i veure a la seva dona plorant, deixa caure els trastos a terra i s'hi acosta dient) [...] (Ella s'abraça a ell) [...] Paulina (Despertant) [...] Rosa (Arreplegant els trastos) [...] Paulina (Guardant la mitja i anant a ajudar a Rosa) [...] Lluís (Arreglant trastos) [...] Rosa (Ajudant a Lluís i parlant a Paulina) [...] Lluís (Donant una pesseta a la vella) [...] Rosa (Li dona un mocador amb un nus) [...]

X. Maria, Rosa i Lluís

[...] Rosa (Agafa el retrato i se'l posa davant per a tapar-se) [...] (Deixa el quadro i s'acosta) [...] Lluís (Mig renyant-la) [...] Rosa (Sense fer-li cas) [...] (Se sent la veu d'en Carlets que puja cantant) [...] Rosa (S'amaga darrere una cortina de la finestra) [...]

XI. Maria, Rosa, Lluís i Carlets

En Carlets encara no ha arribat al replà i en Lluís diu cridant: [...] Carlets (Entra i corre a abraçar en Lluís) [...] (en Carlets el deixa) [...] Rosa (Sortint de darrere la cortina i anant al costat d'en Carlets) [...] (Interrompent-lo i mirant-lo fit a fit) [...] Carlets (Allargant un paquet de tabaco a Lluís) [...] (En Lluís i ell omplen i encenen les pipes) [...] (En Carlets se treu els diners de la butxaca i els compta) [...] Rosa (Posa els diners al mocador, dins d'un nus) [...] Rosa (Fent reverència al retrato) [...] (Rosa haurà girat el retrato cap per avall i el sacseja) [...] (Arracona el retrato) [...] (Carlets i Rosa se'n van cantant la cançó dels ceguets).
