the role of microorganisms in sustainable agriculture

Sustainability is the capacity to continue a certain pattern of behaviour indefinitely.

Conventional agriculture might not be sustainable, since it sometimes ignores the global environmental reality. Microorganisms influence soil fertility and can aid crops to overcome environmental challenges, supporting plant health and yield. Their varied metabolism makes them a powerful option for transforming waste into resources within the overall agrarian system.

To provide educational material about key steps on crop production where microbiology can take part and enhance the sustainability of the farm flows.

Microorganisms influence soil fertility and can aid crops to overcome environmental challenges, supporting plant health and yield. Their varied metabolism makes them a powerful option for transforming waste into resources within the overall agrarian system.

Reflecting on the values that rule over the crop production is of interest for citizens in general, since we are all dependent on the food chain. During the development of the episodes, it became clear how unconnected scientific and rural realities are at some points. This is where the social and environmental interest of the project lies in. Apart from its didactic value, which provides basic knowledge of agro-systems and microbial ecology or metabolism, each episode implies some review of the current model of crop production.

Sustainability is the capacity to continue a certain pattern of behaviour indefinitely.

Conventional agriculture might not be sustainable, since it sometimes ignores the global environmental reality. Microorganisms influence soil fertility and can aid crops to overcome environmental challenges, supporting plant health and yield. Their varied metabolism makes them a powerful option for transforming waste into resources within the overall agrarian system.

To provide educational material about key steps on crop production where microbiology can take part and enhance the sustainability of the farm flows.

Reflecting on the values that rule over the crop production is of interest for citizens in general, since we are all dependent on the food chain. During the development of the episodes, it became clear how unconnected scientific and rural realities are at some points. This is where the social and environmental interest of the project lies in. Apart from its didactic value, which provides basic knowledge of agro-systems and microbial ecology or metabolism, each episode implies some review of the current model of crop production.