

From Mobiles

viii

the little while
    has run
    its measure
    now —

Corbeau —

    where are you,
for I must find you now
like all things
in my life,
    a little late.

xx "quand tu es etranger dans ton ville...."

when night birds
    showing white spots beneath
    their wings,
    become morning birds
    in Elinor's trees,
and there is a musically constructed
    negro
    in a red shirt fishing
    and there are two vagrants reeking with fears and hungers washing themselves in the river, and there are rich voices of negroes echoing,
    and you are a stranger
    in your own town,
watching the fishermen in the early morning.

xxxi

o far continent
    on which
    my one bright star
    has chosen to shine,

be green
be warm

grow the sweet citrons
of content,

forswear
the bitterness of storm,

endow all men
who walk on your sweet ground with grace.

xxxiii

the whipping posts
have all
been set
in re-inforced concrete.
They are practically
permanent.

in whose hand
the whip ?

on whose wrist,
the thongs,
of bondage ?
