Death one gigantic tickling of every nerve -- one sucking off in every orifice -- one gigantic come.

There were strawberries that grew in these fields Lilies that bloomed in these woods Anton Where are they now
The blood red juices ran from our mouths as we joined with our bodies in the lilies.

There is a bridge of destruction between those years and these built with the stored venom of a snake not allowed to strike.

And as we walk in the sunlight of these tamed woods do not expect me to forget the pain those years rained down on my head
do not expect me to forget in this sunlight of this time the years of that pain crowning my head

-- Barbara Franks
New York, New York

It was May

We gathered moss and built our love a trysting place; we banked the charred remains of fallen oak into a warming glow, a monument to first love, in a holy place.

When spring storms came our love-fires died within the thundering pause.

Sometimes your calling echoes back to me from corners of a lonely place ...
I see the flinted sparks which scorched the incense of that dying love and marvel that the ashes lie on sacred ground.

-- Wilma Caudle
Broken Arrow, Oklahoma