THE DRESSING-GOWN

The stranger in the dressing-gown makes her uneasy, like a child growing up over the long summer holidays into a new and nearly equal human being. She must find ways of linking this man who's discarded the bath-towel round his waist, whose glasses are now a permanent feature of his face (not just for reading Official forms and hand-written letters, nor a concession to the Cinema) with the long-familiar furniture of her life. Has he suddenly gone fat round the middle despite the evidence of her eyes? Has he grown out of her knowledge into the sort of man who sends cards back from a holiday abroad, a business trip abroad, by courtesy of a friend, while adultering round the corner? This is so much unlike the man she knew, but the dressing-gown has somehow changed their lives.

200 PERCENT BLACK

He's 100% white with two parents and a pet. At school and play he is black only to those who see colour. Marries the right girl and digs for roots north of his family tree. Here the story ends. 20 years later, the fall-out from Africa covers him with thin ash; and he arms himself to perform the Long March and Middle Passage
on the same week-end.

Now he's on the newsreel
riding in Castro's jeep, sweating through a bush-jacket, 200% Black.

THE ELEMENT OF NO GAMBLE

There is a powerful rain.
Under a tent
three Tibetan muleteers are gambling with cowrie shells.

They hoist the leather dice box and crash it down with much force.

Those shells have value.

It will please them
to give you, for nothing,
a handful of handsome copper coins
from an extinct culture.

THE FALL

Crows are peering in the window.
What have I forgotten this time?

The only crow I ever saw fall
Was one I shot.

He plummeted straight down
And was dead.

All the other crows put on A ritual ceremony around him.
