Piñatas haunt the holidays donkey-shaped or chubby Santas. Obligatory feeds of beans and franks. The whine of countless raindrops in churchyards.

Goddamn wind has no respect. Brute insensitive, blows the tarp off the Packard shedding her poor rusty body nude for the rain's rude inspection.

I can't concentrate. Too many emotional details vying for my attention. Must withdraw. Get out of this negative mode of thought.

Ten pitchers of beer later, careening 80 miles an hour down illegal black night roads, radio too loud, it becomes clear: I've got a bad attitude.
Cannot live joyfully without living with joy. You can't have quality output without quality input.

A quiet Sunday afternoon, kids babysat, we go to the walk-in movies to see Barry Lyndon.
Slow-paced, like a series of paintings. Amoral message: he lived, loved, and died. Or something like that.

OTHER MEN GOBBLE STEAK

Other men gobble steak from glossy menus.
They dribble fresh perked coffee onto starch stiff cuffs, pour cream and stir sweet white sugar cubes. Tinkling silverware beside sunny windows, they read bold newspapers, crinkled and crisp as tossed salads in coffeeshops, diners, cafes, taverns, grills, bars, hole-in-the-wall sandwich shops or else chew pattymelts yellow as checker cabs. They lure pink sweatered secretaries (22 years old and perfect) out to lunch, vague suggestions of afternoon love on their garlic sullied breath.

Other men murder the lunch hour.
