salesman, social worker and writer of poetry

i've longer hair, a goatee, mustache, large gut, suffer from hypertension, rampant cynicism and grinning
half-drunk idiots

"good god, i certainly hope so," i quip, brushing past escaping into the emptiness of the crowded room

some patrons
of this fancy hotel overlooking grand traverse bay wear clothes worth more than my car.

there's money galore
in this neck of michigan, especially in summer
when the beautiful people float in on long, sleek yachts designer sails billowing.

hell, a small glass of beer costs a buck-fifty and

i'm strolling about in faded, old jeans, pullover shirt and paint-spotted, blue suede tennis shoes with bright orange laces. maybe it's the laces, people are staring, as i smile, nod and keep on walking.

so far, only the maids
have smiled back.

TELL ME YOU LOVE ME, JEAN-PAUL SARTRE

the loudmouthed
obnoxious jerk at the end of the bar is black and everybody else
is white and somewhat reluctant to try and shut him up

idiots in bars
never accept responsibility for their behavior

this one will undoubtedly go into a honky-racist routine the moment he's confronted which is exactly what happens when the bartender tells him to cool it

i realize the self-centered prick will never be a devotee of existential syllogism

"isn't," i ask, "it possible for people to dislike you simply because you're an asshole?"

suddenly it's so quiet
i can hear the ice melting into the bourbon

mike plays tennis
works in corporate
public relations

has a beautiful wife
two, quick-witted sons
a house in the suburbs
the sanctity of regular church attendance

yet it bothers him
how everything seems
so blandly preordained
