I love violets. Late one afternoon I was at Woolworth's, and they were having an end-table sale on potted plants. There was one pot of a new variety of violets: blue and white like I like, but developed in Japan to be hardy enough for the tropics. That one was the sample. I begged the salesgirl to sell it to me. The store closed at five, and it was one minute to. She gave it to me without ringing it up.

On Sunday, I went to a nursery looking for new ideas for ground-cover. Turning a corner towards the back, I saw hundreds of violets with a sign saying "New From Japan!" I bought two flats and planted them in my bed. For a while I had all the blue-centered violets I could ever dream of. Then things got busy and I forgot to water them.

CORONA SMITH'S ELEVATOR ADVENTURE

After a loud snap! and dropping two floors, the elevator stopped, a little askew and shaky, at the seventh floor. I press and press the button and yell. Then the door opens. Standing there is a doctor who works in this building, though I am sure she has never noticed me. Apparently she's come in for some papers. She looks wonderful in her Saturday clothes, doesn't notice the slant of the floor.

I decide whatever it takes I must make friends with this woman. So I greet her casually, pretending confidence. The elevator works smoothly, and we chat into the lobby. She invites me out for quenelles. I don't know what those are but say sure, I have the time.

At the restaurant baroque music is playing. I claim I play flute, though I quit in seventh grade. The conversation turns to Woody Allen movies and something I say strikes her as clever. During the meal I admit I was anxious on the elevator, in fact would have bolted off and down seven flights if she hadn't got on. She says what she likes about me is
I'm so honest. I have to confess then that I'm no flutist. She laughs and says I'm only proving her point.

NORMA JEANE

Richard and I drove up to Westwood one night to visit you but it was late — almost midnight — and the gates were locked. We considered scaling the fence but quickly discarded that idea realizing I was too stoned to accomplish such a feat without breaking a limb. We made vague plans to drive up again when the park was open but never did.

Richard and I don't see each other anymore but one of these days I'll drive up alone and tell you what I would have that night, that if I ever have a daughter she'll be called Norma Jeane (with an "e" on the end, the way you spelled it) and she will be very much loved and very much wanted as all children deserve to be.

COME LIVE WITH ME AND BE MY LOVE

Since you have a job we'll be able to rent a nice two-bedroom apartment within walking distance of McDonald's. We'll have two phones and two answering machines but we can share the cats and cleaning supplies.

We'll spend Thanksgiving with your family and Christmas with mine and you'll
