two begun with nothing working up to this?
America, America,
God had shed his grace.

Naked in the cabana to put them in the mood they drank vodka stingers and made what love they could then reeled into the hot tub, too numb to feel regret, and almost joyfully boiled themselves to death.

SOMETIMES A SUDDEN MADNESS

Many have gotten the thing to work, including Van Gogh who got it to work more beautifully than most, although the irony of his all too human life was that he doubted he had when he walked into Dr. Gachet's garden & blew the sun out of his head; sometimes doubt flares up like the sudden madness of a blustering crow in the noonday glare. then it's good to remember the placid heron that wades the beach just before dusk, its legs glowing like two radioactive rods as it stalks its dinner.

DEJA VU

We haven't met before, so I suggest we continue the barroom talk with a getting-to-know-you literary game:

It goes like this, I say. For instance, what story would you read on a stormy night?

I get it, she says. I like to read W. W. Jacobs' The Monkey's Paw on stormy nights.

Oh? I say.

When I go to the seashore in the fall I read Thomas Mann's Death in Venice.

Um, I say.

In Paris I read Fitzgerald's Babylon Revisited.

Unhuh, I say.

When I visit friends at their country house, it's Saki's The Open Window ...

I call the bartender & order another round, having this weird feeling that maybe we have met before.

THE SECRET LIFE OF WALTER MIDDLING

She replies to a mid-life query with what she considers wifely support:

"I think the gray in your beard," she says, "makes you look more sexy as a poet."

I refrain from telling her a secret: that for as long as I can remember sex has been my chief interest with poetry taking second;

so, although her reply to my question was nice, just $\underline{\text{more}}$ $\underline{\text{sexy}}$ would have been nicer.

THE DECLINE OF A WEST

Early on I was enthralled by Ivanhoe & the other novels of Sir Walter Scott, the stories & poetry of R. L. Stevenson & Poe, the pictorial magic of illustrators like Arthur Rackham & the joys of playing baseball fairly well, then upon reaching manhood I became enamored of Hemingway,

F. Scott, Hammett's The Maltese Falcon,
James M. Cain, Camus, Céline,
Dostoevsky, The Ring of the Nibelungs,
Böcklin's paintings,
